The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREST-CULTURE.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report House bill No. 3982 as a substitute for Senate bill No. 801.

The SPEAKER. The correct form would be for the gentleman to report back the Senate bill and to move as a substitute for it whatever the committee may have agreed upon. The Senate bill must be before the House in order to have something to act upon.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Then I report back Senate bill No. 801, to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys, and move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the body of House bill No. 3982, to amend an act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies.

The Senate bill was as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2403. Where settlers make deposits in accordance with the provisions of section 2401, the amount so deposited shall go in part payment for their lands situated in the townships the surveying of which is paid for out of such deposits, or the certificates issued for such deposits may be assigned by indorsement, and be received in payment for any public lands of the United States entered by settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States, and not otherwise.

The substitute was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies,'" approved March 13, 1874, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed his declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, who shall plant, protect, and keep in a healthy, growing condition for eight years ten acres of timber, the trees thereon not being more than four feet apart each way, on any quarter section of any of the public lands of the United States, or five acres on any legal subdivision of eighty acres, or two and one-half acres on any legal subdivision of forty acres, or one-eighth part of any fractional subdivision of land less than forty acres, shall be entitled to a patent for the whole of said quarter section, or of such legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres, or fractional subdivision of less than forty acres, as the case may be, at the expiration of said eight years, on making proof of such fact by not less than two credible witnesses, and a full compliance of the further conditions as provided in section 2: Provided further, That not more than one-quarter of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, unless fractional subdivisions of less than forty acres are entered which in the aggregate shall not exceed one quarter section.

SEC. 2. That the person applying for the benefits of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land district in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the register or the receiver, or the clerk of some court of record, or officer authorized to administer oaths in the district where the land is situated; which affidavit shall be as follows, to-wit:

"I, ——— ———, having filed my application, number ——, for an entry under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies,'" approved ——— —, 187-, do solemnly swear [or affirm] that I am the head of a family [or over twenty-one years of age] and a citizen of the United States [or have declared my intention to become such;] that the section of land specified in my said application is composed exclusively of prairie lands, naturally devoid of timber; that this filing and entry is made for the cultivation of timber and for my own exclusive use and benefit; that I have made the said application in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculation or directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever; that I intend to hold and cultivate the land and to fully comply with the provisions of this said act; and that I have not heretofore made an entry under this act or the acts of which this is amendatory."

And upon filing said affidavit with said register and said receiver, and on payment of $10, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land specified; and the party making an entry of a quarter section under the provisions of this act shall be required to break or plow five acres covered thereby the first year, five acres the second year, and to cultivate to crop or otherwise the five acres broken or plowed the first year; the third year he or she shall cultivate to crop or otherwise the five acres broken the second year and to plant in timber, seeds, or cuttings the five acres first broken or plowed and to cultivate to crop or otherwise the remaining five acres, and fourth year to plant in timber, seeds, or cuttings the remaining five acres. A party making an entry of eighty acres shall break or plow and plant at the times hereinbefore prescribed one-half of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter section, and a party making an entry of forty acres shall break or plow and plant, at the times hereinbefore prescribed, one quarter of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter section, or a proportionate quantity for any smaller fractional sub division: Provided, however, That in case such trees, seeds, or cuttings shall be destroyed by grasshoppers, or by extreme and unusual drought, for any year or term of years, the time for planting such timber, seeds, or cuttings shall be extended one year for every such year that they are destroyed: Provided, That the person making such entry shall, before he or she shall be entitled to such extension of time, file with the register and the receiver of the proper land office an affidavit, corroborated by two witnesses, setting forth the destruction of such timber, and that in consequence of such destruction he or she is compelled to ask an extension of time, in accordance with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That no final certificate shall be given or patent issued for the land so entered until the expiration of eight years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within five years thereafter, the person making such entry, or, if he or she be dead, his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he or she or they have planted and for not less than eight years have cultivated and protected such quantity and character of timber as aforesaid, and at the time of making such proof that there shall be then growing at least nine hundred living and thrifty trees to each acre, they shall receive a patent for such quarter section or legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres of land, or for any fractional quantity of less than forty acres, as herein provided.

SEC. 3. That if at any time after the filing of said affidavit, and prior to the issuing of a patent for said land, said party shall fail to do the breaking and planting required by this act, or any part thereof, or shall fail to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, excepting such cases as are provided for in this act, then, and in that event, such land shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws, or by some other person under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the party making claim to said land, either as a homestead settler or under this act, shall give, at the time of filing his application, such notice to the original claimant as shall be prescribed by the rules established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the rights of the parties shall be determined as in other contested cases.

SEC. 4. That no land acquired under the provisions of this act shall, in any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the final certificate therefor.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall each be entitled to receive $2 at the time of entry, and the like sum when the claim is finally established and the final certificate issued.

SEC. 6. That the fifth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act to punish crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1857, shall extend to all oaths, affirmations, and affidavits required or authorized by this act.

SEC. 7. That parties who have already made entries under the acts approved March 3, 1873, and March 13, 1874, of which this is amendatory, shall be permitted to complete the same upon full compliance with the provisions of this act; that is, they shall, at the time of making their final proof, have had under cultivation, as required by this act, an amount of timber sufficient to make the number of acres required by this act.

SEC. 8. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. WIGGINTON] to yield to me to offer two amendments to the substitute.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I will yield to hear them read.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to amend section 1 of the substitute by striking out the words "the trees thereon not being more than four feet apart each way;" I also move to amend the third paragraph of section 2, near the close of the section, by striking out the word "and" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "that not less than twenty-seven hundred trees were planted on each acre and that;" so that it will read as follows:

Shall prove by two credible witnesses that he or she or they have planted, and, for not less than eight years, have cultivated and protected such quantity and character of timber as aforesaid, that not less than twenty-seven hundred trees were planted on each acre, and that at the time of making such proof that there shall be then growing at least nine hundred living and thrifty trees to each acre.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I have no objection to those amendments.

The amendments to the substitute were agreed to; and then the substitute, as amended, was adopted.

The Senate bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WIGGINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEBRASKA AND MISSOURI.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 599, to change a portion of the boundary line between the States of Missouri and Nebraska, and to cede a portion of the State of Nebraska to the State of Missouri, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 179) giving the consent of the Congress of the United States to the Legislature of the State of Nebraska to cede and transfer certain territory now under the jurisdiction of the State of Nebraska to the State of Missouri, the Legislature of Missouri consenting thereto; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution provides for giving the consent of Congress to the Legislature of the State of Nebraska to cede and transfer to the State of Missouri, the Legislature of Missouri consenting thereto, all that part of the Territory of Nebraska lying on the east side of the Missouri River, known as McKissick's Island, in the county of Nemaha, Nebraska, including sections 25 and 36, in township 7 north, of range 15, and sections 30 and 31, in township 7 north, of range 16, and section 1, in township 6 north, of range 15, and section 6, in township 6 north, of range 16.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask whether the people of this island desire to have this change made.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. My information is that the people desire it. The bed of the river has changed so as to throw this island on the Missouri side. This joint resolution simply gives the consent of Congress to this transfer, both States consenting thereto.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS FOR COLORADO, NEVADA, AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1874, a bill (H. R. No. 4801) to place the States of California, Nevada, and Colorado upon an equality with other States in the matter of public lands for school purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to raise a point of order on the bill.

Mr. BEEBE. From the reading of the bill there seems to be this defect: although the State of California, for instance, may have selected a number of sections 16 and 36, the bill makes no provision for the exception of those sections, but authorizes the State to select as many sections 16 and 36 as there may be in the entire State.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Oh, no.

Mr. BEEBE. I think that an examination of the bill will bear me out. I listened very attentively to the reading.

Mr. CONGER. I think the bill had better be printed and go to the Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. If the gentleman insists on the point of order I have no objection; but——

Mr. CONGER. To meet this very deficiency section 36 was given to these States in addition to section 16 given to other States. Now this bill proposes that not only the deficiency of section 16 but also of section 36 be granted out of other lands. I do not know that this is not right, but I prefer to see the bill in print.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman insists on the point of order; and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask that the bill be printed and that I have permission to file a report which shall also be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

LAND GRANTS TO TERRITORIES FOR UNIVERSITY PURPOSES.

Mr. KIDDER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 787) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, for university purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to reserve a point of order on the bill.

Mr. EDEN. In some of the Territories there is a large amount of mineral lands. Is it intended to include those in this grant?

Mr. KIDDER. Not at all.

Mr. EDEN. Mineral lands are excluded?

Mr. KIDDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will ask the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. KIDDER] whether this bill is not in harmony with previous bills providing for universities in the States.

Mr. KIDDER. It is.

Mr. DUNNELL. This bill, in my opinion, contains some very admirable provisions and safeguards. Like provisions were incorporated in the bill with reference to Colorado. It will be seen that the proceeds of these sales are to be converted into United States bonds and to become a permanent fund. None of these lands can be sold for less than $2.50 per acre.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes a point of order that this bill provides for the disposition of public lands and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KIDDER. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. CONGER. I have made the point because I think the bill should provide that no part of the fund given by the United States should be used for buildings; that the fund should be devoted to educational purposes entirely. I think the bill ought to be amended in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the public Calendar.

Mr. REAGAN. The morning hour has expired. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KIDDER. The bill is no doubt subject to the point of order; but if I can be indulged a moment, I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw it. If there is the least objection to the passage of the bill, I shall not press it now.

Mr. CONGER. My only objection is what I have stated. I do not like the disposition of the fund.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw the point of order, and let the bill go over until the next morning hour.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I renew the point of order.

PAYMENT OF FRAUDULENT CLAIMS BY THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] with the understanding that his proposition shall elicit no debate.

Mr. MANNING. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have adopted the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report for the year 1877, referring to the payment of claims against the Government, said, "most of these claims are paid out of what are classed as permanent annual appropriations, contained in section 3689, Revised Statutes, which do not come under the annual supervision of Congress. These appropriations, though declared to be annual, have been used for the payment of claims however old, including nearly every case of fraudulent or exaggerated claims paid by this Department:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House what fraudulent claims have been paid by the Treasury Department from the appropriations authorized by section 3689, Revised Statutes, and what fraudulent claims, if any, have been paid from other appropriations since June 22, 1874, up to and including the date of his said annual report—the amount and date of each fraudulent claim paid during the time above mentioned, specifying the appropriation from which paid, the nature of each claim, to whom paid; and what recommendations have been made or action taken or ordered by the Treasury Department to recover any money thus paid, with the date of such recommendations, action, or orders, and a statement of the result, if any, of such recommendations, action, or orders in each case; and also to furnish this House with the evidence upon which said statement of fraud is predicated.

Mr. FOSTER. I object. I will inform the gentleman that he will find the information which this resolution calls for in document of this House, No. 27.

Mr. MANNING. I think the gentleman, if he will examine that document, will not find the information which this resolution calls for.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I shall.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist on the objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole. I give notice that I do this for the purpose of taking up what is known as the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I am reluctant to antagonize that bill; but we have agreed by unanimous consent to consider this morning the bill from the Committee on Commerce regulating interstate transportation; and I suggest that the gentleman has not the right now to interpose the question of consideration as against an arrangement made by the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this arrangement was adopted by unanimous consent which is equivalent to a suspension of the rules, but the remedy the gentleman seeks would be in raising the question of consideration. If the motion to consider the bill indicated by the gentleman from Texas be voted down, then the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of reaching the bill granting pensions to surviving Mexican soldiers would be in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, can the question of consideration be raised against what has been determined by the unanimous consent of the House?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; for it may so happen when the House reaches the question fixed for a certain day it may not be ready at the time to consider it and may on the question of consideration being raised by a majority vote to go to other business.

Mr. REAGAN. I know under the rules of the House such may be the case, but——

Mr. BUCKNER. The object of the gentleman is to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. But when the House by unanimous consent has fixed a certain time for the consideration of a bill, can that unanimous consent be set aside under the question of consideration? If so, I have not seen the decision by which it can be done.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I only gave my consent at the time knowing under the practice of the House we could raise the question of consideration if it were deemed necessary to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of consideration can be raised.

Mr. BURCHARD. There would be objection to the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up a particular bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not make that motion.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman has only raised the question of consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Certainly; and if the House determines not to consider the bill of the gentleman from Texas, then I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, giving notice that I shall make the effort to call up for consideration the bill granting pensions to the Mexican soldiers.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise now, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of withdrawing my objection to the university bill.

The SPEAKER. That bill has been passed.

Mr. REAGAN. In order to get out of the way of the other committees of the House the Committee on Commerce waived its privilege in the morning hour on the express condition that it should have unanimous consent to proceed to-day to the consideration of the bill relative to interstate commerce. If the question of consideration can now be raised, then that agreement was a cheat and a fraud and defeats the bill. Surely it is not parliamentary law or parliamentary usage to indulge in a cheat and a fraud.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Texas ought to know the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLS. That is what very few on this floor seem to know.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If he is cheated, then the gentleman has only cheated himself.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not as familiar, perhaps, with the rules of the House as the gentleman from Alabama, but I am familiar with the rules of common honesty and general understanding.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman does not propose to intimate that any member of this House is acting dishonestly?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Alabama had it in his power to prevent the agreement by his single objection. If he did not do it, he has now no right to come in here when we have reached the day and hour fixed for the consideration of this interstate-commerce bill in order to prevent its being taken up for consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have the right to assert my privilege as a member under the rules of this House, and that I am doing and nothing more, as the Speaker has decided. I gave my consent knowing that under the rules of this House and under the practice of the House any member could raise the question of consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman can raise the question of consideration, but not against the unanimous consent and agreement of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 54 to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

54. After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER. "And to the orders of the day." This is the order of business fixed by unanimous consent, as the gentleman from Texas has stated, for this day. The only point that the gentleman from Alabama can raise to proceeding to the consideration of this bill at this time would be what under the rule is known as "the question of consideration."

Mr. REAGAN. Let me say this: under the rules of the House, when we proceed to the consideration of the orders of the day the question of consideration may be raised, but when this House has given its unanimous consent to do a particular thing at a particular hour, if when that hour arrives that unanimous consent can be set aside and rendered of no account, then no member will trust himself to the treachery of unanimous consent, for it will amount to nothing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized, by causing the rule to be read, that the gentleman from Texas in respect to his bill has the privilege of calling it up as the order of the day. But the gentleman from Alabama has the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. As the gentleman from Texas exhibits so much feeling in this matter and appears to think some one is trying to cheat him, I will give way to him.

Mr. REAGAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in support of his position as to raising the question of consideration that under Rule 41 it is expressly provided "when any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker." It will be seen that the question of privilege can be raised even against a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair mistakes the distinction made by my colleague. One is a proceeding in subordination to the rules of the House, while the other is a proceeding in defiance of the rules of the House and by unanimous consent. In the latter instance the House takes it from under the rules and falls back upon its sovereignty aside and away from the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is only to give it a status for consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the gentleman from Alabama has waived the question of consideration.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] withdraws the question of consideration and the House now as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the order under which we proceed be read.

The SPEAKER. At the time the order was made the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] was on the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the five-minute rule apply?

The SPEAKER. That is the order. The Chair will cause to be read from the RECORD the proceedings when the order was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRAGG obtained the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me, I desire to make another proposition to the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I decline to yield the floor if my doing so shall interfere with my retaining it.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose to interfere with the gentleman's retaining the floor; but perhaps he would prefer occupying the floor at another time. I propose, if it be agreeable to the House, that it shall be ordered by unanimous consent that at the close of the morning hour on Saturday this bill be considered, and the previous question not called earlier than half past four o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas now proposes that the pending bill be taken out of the morning hour, and that its consideration be assigned for Saturday next immediately after the morning hour, and that debate shall close and a vote be taken on the bill and pending amendments at half past four o'clock instead of half past three, thus allowing more time for debate. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a question: whether he will not modify his proposition so as to allow the bill to be considered on Saturday in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to that. Perhaps in that way we may get more intelligent debate on the bill. But let it be with the understanding that the previous question shall be called at that hour.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is it the understanding that the previous question shall be called at that time?

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily. The proposition is that the previous question shall not be called until then.

Mr. BRAGG. It is understood that if I yield the floor now I shall be entitled to the floor when the consideration of the bill is resumed on Saturday

The SPEAKER. The Chair will so consider. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, as modified?

There was no objection, and the order was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say notwithstanding the form of the agreement, as there has been an hour's speech made in favor of the bill, it seems to me fair that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] or those who agree with him in antagonizing the bill should have an hour for general debate against it. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then will understand the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor in his own right for one hour, and thereafter the debate shall be conducted as by agreement under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no objection to that provided the gentleman does not occupy the floor longer than he speaks himself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has his rights. He stipulated distinctly for them.

Mr. KENNA. As I understand what occurred the other day and as I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin now, he does not claim any longer time than he desires to occupy himself; and I submit that would not be in accordance with the understanding when the agreement was made.

The SPEAKER. Nothing was said about the length of time. The gentleman from Wisconsin claimed his rights as being on the floor. He yielded, if it did not interfere with his right, to the unanimous agreement. The right that he maintained was that he should have the floor in his own right for one hour, and the Chair understands this morning that the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who has charge of the bill, assents to that.

Mr. CONGER. I presume if the gentleman from Wisconsin has time which he does not wish to occupy the understanding is he gives it to those who are opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, that if the gentleman from Wisconsin does not occupy the whole time it shall be occupied by those adverse to the bill, more than one hour having been occupied by those favorable to it. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas in a spirit of pure equity to agree to that.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. That leaves the gentleman from Wisconsin to dispose of his hour as he sees fit.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he has more than his hour to give it to those who are opposed to the bill, and not to its friends.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] gives his assent to that suggestion. The House being as in Committee of the Whole during the consideration of this bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will please take the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRAGG. I am opposed to the passage of this bill; and as the bill purports to be one of very great benefit to the agricultural interest of the West, which in part I represent, I desire to state as clearly as I may my objections to the bill in order that my opposition to it may not be misconstrued.

I have always, sir, been an opponent of railway monopoly and I am not prepared now at this time of life to yield the ground which I have always maintained upon that subject. When this bill is introduced it is announced that it is a bill for the purpose of restricting monopolies; it is a bill for the purpose of putting railways and other common carriers under the control and regulation of law for the benefit of the producing, agricultural interest.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, instead of being the bill it purports to be, is a bill directly in antagonism to the very interests that it purports to support, foster, and maintain.

I submit to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if there ever was a bill introduced into the National Legislature or into any State Legislature that interfered with or restricted the rights of railway corporations, whether the corridors and lobbies were not filled with men representing railroad interests urging their members to do all they might do to prevent the passage of a bill which would interfere with them in the rates which they imposed on the people. Then I ask him whether any railway company has ever raised its voice against this bill—whether or not all the railway companies and the great railway kings are not in favor of this bill, and under the pretense of protecting the farmer and his interests are preparing a bill here by which they themselves can form a combination by which they can ruin at their will all the interests that this bill proposes to protect? I shall as soon expect to see the beautiful waters of the Kiskiminetas River improved under the river and harbor bill, carrying on its broad bosom all the commerce of the world, having floating thereon the flag of every nation—just so soon as I shall expect Tom Scott's legislature to instruct their Representatives in this House to vote for a bill that is hostile to his interests.

I see by the RECORD that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has instructed their Representatives in this House to support this bill as a wise and beneficent measure.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman call it Tom Scott's legislature? Is it not the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRAGG. So far as I know from past experience, with the addition of one or two more clans in that State which have Scotch names, the clans combined are simply synonymous of the term "Pennsylvania Legislature."

I oppose this bill, Mr. Speaker, first, because I doubt the power of Congress to legislate on this subject; secondly, if it has the power, that it is an unwise use of power to exercise it in the manner as it is proposed to be exercised in this bill; thirdly, that the bill does not accomplish the purpose that it pretends to accomplish, but accomplishes directly the opposite purpose.

I may be old-fashioned, sir, in my notions, but I feel that in judging the question of State rights, after the great struggle that has taken place in which it has risen to be a bugbear in the minds of all modern statesmen, we must guard against running away from the doctrine of State rights and running in the contrary direction. In trying to get away from one evil you are apt to drop into an evil greater than it. I do not believe that when the Constitution was adopted conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States the wise men who framed that instrument ever intended that Congress should make laws regulating the rates that a wagon might charge for transportation if it happened to pass over a State line, or regulating the business of private corporations or persons, whether engaged as common carriers or otherwise. I do not believe that they ever intended that the rates of transportation upon railways, that the rates of transportation upon steamboats, that the price that is to be paid for the carriage of wheat by steamer from Chicago to a port in a different State, say Buffalo, were to be subject to the law of Congress; that Congress could say to the shipper at Chicago how much he should pay for carrying his freight to Buffalo or to the shipper at Pittsburgh what he should pay for carrying it down the river to Saint Louis. The very moment we adopt the precedent that Congress can so interfere, we have done that which is calculated to promote a general centralization of power in the Federal Government; this will become not a Government of confederated States but a Government representing a centralized power. If we can say to the shipper in Ohio, who ships his goods to Pennsylvania, that we have a right to fix the price he shall charge upon the freightage of the goods; why might we not say to the merchant in Chicago who charges a higher rate upon his goods to the people of Pennsylvania than he does to the people of Ohio, "Sir, you must sell your goods at the same price; you are discriminating against Pennsylvania."

It has been announced upon this floor that this bill originated in Pennsylvania; Pennsylvania comes here crying for protection; her iron must be protected; her steel must be protected; her manufactures must be protected; her oil wells must be protected, and Tom Scott must be protected against competition from the New York Central Railroad, the New York and Erie Railroad, and the Canada roads, whose competition compels him to reduce his rates of freightage.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the point he is now making, if he will allow me.

Mr. BRAGG. Presently I will.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply wish to state——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not now. Now, in order to determine what the framers of the Constitution meant, we are to look at the condition of things as they existed when the Constitution was adopted; we are to listen to the voices of the fathers who framed the Constitution and who may be presumed to have known what they intended and what they meant. At that time there was no such thing as railway communication. I shall read upon the subject from an old-fogy book called the Federalist one of Mr. Madison's articles upon this question, showing what was the intention of the framers of the Constitution by this clause. It was to prevent the States, powers within the Federal Government, from discriminating against other States as States, and was not intended to relate in any manner to business transactions between the people of the different States. Mr. Madison says, in the Federalist, on page 292:

> The defect of power in the existing confederacy to regulate the commerce between its several members, is in the number of those which have been clearly pointed out by experience. To the proofs and remarks which former papers have brought into view on this subject, it may be added that without this supplemental provision the great and essential power of regulating foreign commerce would have been incomplete and ineffectual. A very material object of this power was the relief of the States which import and export through other States from the improper contributions levied on them by the latter. Were these at liberty to regulate the trade between State and State, it must be foreseen that ways would be found out to load the articles of import and export during the passage through their jurisdiction with duties which would fall on the makers of the latter and the consumers of the former. We may be assured by past experience that such a practice would be introduced by future contrivances; and, both by that and a common knowledge of human affairs, that it would nourish unceasing animosities and not improbably terminate in serious interruptions of the public tranquillity. To those who do not view the question through the medium of passion or of interest, the desire of the commercial States to collect, in any form, an indirect revenue from their uncommercial neighbors must appear not less impolitic than it is unfair, since it would stimulate the injured party, by resentment as well as interest, to resort to less convenient channels for their foreign trade. But the mild voice of reason, pleading the cause of an enlarged and permanent interest, is but too often drowned before public bodies as well as individuals by the clamors of an impatient avidity for immediate and immoderate gain.
> The necessity of a superintending authority over the reciprocal trade of confederated states has been illustrated by other examples as well as our own. In Switzerland, where the union is so very slight, each canton is obliged to allow to merchandise a passage through its jurisdiction into other cantons without an augmentation of the tolls. In Germany, it is a law of the empire that the princes and states shall not lay tolls or customs on bridges, rivers, or passages without the consent of the Emperor and the Diet; though it appears from a quotation in an antecedent paper that the practice in this, as in many other instances in that confederacy, has not followed the law, and has produced there the mischiefs which have been foreseen here. Among the restraints imposed by the union of the Netherlands on its members, one is, that they shall not establish imposts disadvantageous to their neighbors without the general permission.

This illustration of the purposes which were intended by the adoption of this provision of the Constitution in relation to the regulation of commerce shows clearly that it was aimed at the States, so as to prevent one State from imposing any impost, duty, burden, or hardship upon the exports or imports of any other State which might be passing through its borders. This seems to me to be entirely clear from the reasoning of Mr. Madison.

But if it be not clear, I am one of those who believe in the language of old George Clinton, than whom there was no more sound statesman in this country, that Government is best supported not by the assumption of any doubtful power, but by the wise and energetic use of such power as is incontestible.

But this bill is subject to another constitutional objection, in my judgment. The fourth and sixth sections of the bill propose to regulate the tariff which shall be charged upon goods carried by common carriers where that transportation is wholly within the boundaries of a State. There are gentlemen upon this floor who do not admit that is the true construction of this bill. I maintain that that is its true construction, and I am supported in that by one of the gentlemen who support this bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who tells you that the provisions of this bill were drawn up for the purpose of providing against a discrimination in the transportation of oil from the oil-wells of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BRAGG. Not at all.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman does not wish to be corrected, then?

Mr. BRAGG. After I get through I will answer any question you have to ask.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the gentleman does not wish to proceed upon a false statement of the purposes of the bill. I wanted to say that it simply defines what is interstate commerce and deals with nothing else.

Mr. BRAGG. It may be that this bill intends nothing but interstate commerce. That would call me to comment upon this bill from the fact that it looks as if some one had clipped words out of a dictionary of every kind of language in the world, which had been then shaken up in a basket and enough drawn out to make these sentences, giving as many "ifs" and "ands" and "whereases" and "aforesaids" as possible, so as to clog up this bill until one might well call it a bill more for the purpose of encouraging litigation that might grow out of the railway transportation than anything else. The fourth section of this bill to which I referred is as follows:

> SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to charge or receive any greater freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward for the carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, for a shorter than for a longer distance—

I suppose that means that a carrier may charge just as much for carrying freight from Westchester to New York as from Buffalo to New York. It says that he shall not charge any greater freight for a shorter than for a longer distance—> or for the carriage of any of the same per mile than shall be charged per mile, and received and retained, for the carriage of property of the same or substantially same or similar kind, the carriage of which is or is to be entirely performed within one State or Territory, and which is, is to be, or should have been carried at the same time or substantially the same time or times; and the charges, compensation, and reward for the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, and storing of any property so carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid shall be no greater than the charges, compensation, or reward received and retained, respectively, for the same or substantially the same or similar act or acts, service or services, done or performed, or which is or are to be or should have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times, for or as to property of the same or substantially the same or similar kind, the carriage of which is, or is to be, completed within one State or Territory.

There, I have read for the benefit of this House the most perspicuous section of this bill, and I have no doubt that every member of the House who listened to it understands thoroughly all the questions that can be raised under it and precisely what the committee intended by it. I do not. But it certainly provides for regulating the rates of freight where the transportation is to be entirely within one State.

The proviso to section 6 goes further and recognizes that as being its principal purpose, where provision is made relative to the change of the schedule of rates:

But it is expressly provided, That if change is made in the freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward to be paid for the carriage, receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any property carried or to be carried wholly in one State or Territory—

This is but a single proviso; it is not a very long thing and gentlemen will very readily understand it—then the freight, rate of freight, charge, compensation, and reward, respectively, for the same or substantially the same or similar carriage, act or acts, service or services, for or as to any property to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, shall not be greater than the freight, rate of freight, compensation, and reward, respectively, for the same or substantially the same carriage, act or acts, service or services, for or as to property of the same, or substantially the same or similar kind, the carriage of which is or is to be performed within one State or Territory, done or performed, or which is to be or should have been done or performed, at the same or substantially the same time or times.

Now, in my judgment, that simple proviso means that by this bill Congress may undertake to regulate the transportation by common carriers of freight within a State, or else it provides that every bushel of grain that is shipped from Minnesota shall be subject to the local freight rates of Minnesota, to the local rates of Iowa, to the local rates of Illinois, to the local rates of Ohio, and to the local rates of Pennsylvania, or the local rates of New York, in order to get to market. It either is the one thing or the other. It either means that the price fixed in a State is to be the standard, or else this bill asserts the power in Congress to provide for a standard in those States.

Now, if we attempt to provide a standard of freight for goods that are carried within State lines, the moment that we undertake to do that we interfere directly with the power of a State to regulate its own corporations, which power has been supported and maintained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the "granger" cases, in which it recognized the constitutional power in the State. If we exercise that power and they exercise the power, each exercising together and each being separate and distinct from the other, we bring about at once a conflict between State and Federal jurisdiction, and those conflicts provided for in this bill must all be settled in the Federal courts.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BRAGG. Presently I will; not now.

Mr. REAGAN. I had hoped that the gentleman did not wish to misrepresent the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I am speaking upon this bill as I understand it. I have read it only four times and abstracted it once, and from the sections which I have read here this morning gentlemen will readily understand that perhaps I have made a mistake in some of the deductions I have drawn from it.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know that we only say that where State rates are adopted they shall not charge interstate commerce more than those State rates?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not find any such clause in this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. That in no case do we say that any rate of freight shall be charged?

Mr. BRAGG. I am arguing this bill not upon the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. If I were arguing it in that way, I should do him the justice to say that I would support his intention. I am arguing the thing which the committee gave birth to, not what they intended to give birth to.

As I said, we have in this bill a direct recognition of the power of States to regulate transportation charges; and if we pass the bill, even though it may not be so bad as I think it is, yet every member will see at a glance that it is so drawn as to be subject to all sorts of constructions; and the multiplicity of constructions to which it is liable will lead to an endless amount of litigation, which litigation the bill provides shall all take place in the Federal courts, no matter who may be the parties, no matter what may be the amount involved. The moment a farmer, whether his claim be large or small, seeks to enforce any of the provisions of this bill or to claim any of his rights under it, the bill itself provides that those questions shall be determined in the Federal courts. Thus the man will be taken from his vicinage and put to more expense than all the loss he may sustain by reason of a breach of the law, independently of the loss of time to himself and his witnesses.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I regard the passage of this bill, even though the constitutional power exists in Congress, as unwise and impolitic. I am astonished to see gentlemen representing what was originally the old State rights party coming in here to father a bill which assumes on the part of Congress power to go into all the States and regulate the business of private corporations, corporations never created or organized by this body; corporations that have their life and being as children of these States. Not stopping here the bill proposes to deal with common carriers as a class so as to interfere with and restrict their business, providing that, whether corporations or private persons, they shall not make any special contracts.

I say further that this bill is hostile to the interests which I represent and to the great agricultural interests of the West. I do not care how much its advocates may claim they are doing for us. We ask no such interference. Our experience has been that whenever railroad corporations select Washington as the scene of their operations they have too much money and too much influence for any farmer in the West to compete with them.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he means by insinuation or direct statement to say that any railway corporation or interest has influenced the action of the committee in this case?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not, sir. I maintain that the railroad corporations, seeing the bent of the committee, quietly let them rush on spreading a net which was expected to catch the railroad corporations; but instead of that the committee have dug a pit into which all the interests they are seeking to protect will fall. What I meant to be understood as saying was this: we are opposed to the principle that this question should ever come to Congress for the reason that if Congress once exercises this power and legislates in this direction we make Congress the forum where the railroad companies will send their representatives; and our experience in the past is that individual interests representing the agriculture of the West stand no chance in a competition at Washington with the railroad corporations. Not that they procured this bill to be passed, but that the bill establishes the precedent of congressional legislation which in the end will swallow us up entirely, because it will congregate the entire railroad force here, where the people have no one to represent them except those gentlemen who represent the agricultural districts from the extreme far West and the South.

There is another consideration against the bill, and it is one in regard to which I know there will be no disagreement between the gentleman representing the Committee on Commerce and myself. The railroads leading from the great business centers of the West are protected under this bill against all competition either between themselves or with any adverse interest. We have now a competition by which for a portion of the year we may send by water or we may send across Michigan and the two Canada roads; we may send over the Lake Shore road and the Erie; we may send over the Lake Shore road and the New York Central; we may send over the Pittsburgh and Fort Wayne, and the Pennsylvania Central; or we may send over the Baltimore and Ohio road. We have seen what the experience of business men teaches that, when business gets dull those great trunk lines enter into competition with each other in order to keep their rolling-stock in use, and even if the business does not pay a profit to the stockholders, it at least helps to pay the interest upon their indebtedness and the salaries of their officers. They induce freight to be shipped by reducing rates; and the moment one of those trunk lines reduces its rates, it of necessity forces other trunk lines to do the same. While these lines are quarreling among themselves, the farmers are permitted, under cover of their fight, to send their products to market at rates which will enable them to raise their wheat, grain and other products and forward them to the eastern market at remunerative prices. But by the terms of this bill there is an absolute prohibition against competition. All that is necessary to be done is for the great trunk lines to meet; and this bill compels them to meet.

They make one schedule and it is a schedule for all. It protects one against the other; Garrett against Scott and Scott against Garrett, and the representatives of Vanderbilt against both. Not being obliged to fight each other, they turn all their individual power and power of corporations to consuming what little is left by the grasshoppers to the farmers of the West. [Laughter.] That is the reason why I oppose it. I do not propose to put it in the power of these railroad corporations to unite and make a schedule of rates which the laws will protect and to make them a law which will punish any one of the roads which violates that law by carrying at a less rate. And that is the purpose of the bill, and, such being its purpose, it is directly in hostility and antagonism to the interests I represent; and I desire those people whom I represent to know when I oppose this bill I do not oppose it because it is a restriction upon railroad corporations, but I oppose it because I regard it as a fraud and a deception upon the people and really in the interest of the railroad instead of adverse to it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. EDEN in the chair.) To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAGG. Under the understanding I do not know whether my friend from Pennsylvania desires to speak for or against the bill, but if I had my own direction I would yield to him; but I heard of something of an obligation and understanding it should only be yielded to such as were adverse to the bill. If that be the understanding of the House, of course it would not be proper to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I much prefer to yield to him if the House consents.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am for the bill; and if there is an understanding of that kind, I of course yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin will exercise his own judgment; he has an hour and will yield the floor to whom he pleases.

Mr. BRAGG. Then, under that understanding, I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEAN.]

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Speaker, the fourth section of the pending bill provides that there shall not be charged a greater rate of freight for a short distance than for a longer distance. This question of the comparative charges of through and local freights has been before committees of the Legislature of Massachusetts in reference to our railroads at different times, because the people living on the lines of the road seeing through freights passing by their doors from the far West at very low rates while they had themselves to pay for short distances much higher rates per mile, naturally desired the benefit of the cheaper transportation. This bill provides that it shall be unlawful to charge any "greater freight, rate of freight, compensation, or reward for the carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, for a shorter than for a longer distance, or for the carriage of any of the same per mile," &c. So that it covers the question of the aggregate charge. It covers the question of the rate of freight as well. Persons doing a large business and paying large amounts for freights would naturally say "if we can get along by paying the same rate of freight that through traffic pays, it would be a great saving to us."

And accordingly they have appealed to the Legislature and been heard before the committees of the Legislature of Massachusetts, for the purpose of enforcing some legislation to give them the same low rates of freight charged for through freights, and invariably the investigation has sent them home with the conviction on their own part that what they asked was wrong, or, at any rate, impracticable. Take for instance—and I will only speak of my own State as a matter of illustration, and the illustration tests the provisions of this bill; our Massachusetts railroads are mostly short roads; they were chartered in the inception in this country of railroads—the Boston and Lowell Railroad, for instance, is only about twenty-five miles long. It connects with the Nashua and Lowell Railroad, which runs into New Hampshire between Lowell and Nashua, one city in New Hampshire and the other in Massachusetts, and is only fifteen miles long. So they go on by small roads until they connect with the great routes to the far West. These great routes, however, by having a manager for each road, have succeeded in accomplishing results substantially the same as if they were one continuous road, and by an arrangement between themselves they have established very low rates for through freights, and have furnished ample terminal facilities for the great and growing business of the great West. It was an easy thing to see when it came to be examined that it was utterly impossible for these roads to live upon the low through rates; that if they were to only receive the low through rates they could not exist. In other words, these roads were kept up by local freights; that they were supported by local freights; and that they paid dividends largely, if not mostly, out of their local business.

And yet what they did get, what little they did get for the through trade went simply so far in supporting the roads and paying the dividends. Now, to say they shall only charge the same rate for the short freight that is charged for the long freight would make it utterly impossible for the roads in any thickly settled community to exist. And I have known instances where persons have been before committees of Legislatures seeking relief when they have had the working of this explained to them who have seen it was utterly impossible for them to insist upon their demands and have gone home satisfied. They learned that the road must be supported by the local, short freights alone, if there were no through freights, and that all that was received for through freights helped to support the roads for their benefit and so far lessened their burdens. But let us see the benefit of this upon those sending through freights from the West to the seaboard and the consequences of passing this bill upon those interests which seek its passage.

Now, the through freights are low because of the great help received from local business, the two kinds of business making roads strong and powerful enough to do well all the western business.

But suppose that some of these short roads—which now are having hard times enough to make ends meet—should be compelled, because they could not reduce their charges for freights to the low rates of long through freights, to refuse the through freights in order to maintain their local freights, would not that be an injury to the western producer? Is not he better off with the competition of roads than without it, or than by lessening the number of competing roads?

Now, what I have said of one of our lines of railroad may be said of others of them, for while we reach New Hampshire from Boston in thirty miles we reach Rhode Island and Connecticut in fifty miles.

Now, will you say that these roads, which have done so much to aid through freights, which have done so much to furnish terminal facilities for your western and southern process, shall abandon this great business or seek to obtain its income by an increase of passenger rates? For you know these roads must live somehow. Besides through freights once on the cars go a thousand miles without handling, while local freights cost much more trouble and expense.

There are other considerations to be thought of.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRAGG. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, is one that comes with great plausibility as a measure professedly against corporations but which is believed to be framed in their interest; one that professes to meet the abuses of our railroad system, but yet I venture to say it is one that most members of this House look upon with great distrust. I regret that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] used so much of his time in discussing the constitutional question, because the practical business question involved in this bill is after all the only question for us to consider. I hold that the Constitution affords ample powers to regulate interstate commerce. I hold, moreover, that this power it behooves us to exercise judiciously and intelligently against these corporations.

The purpose is, as has been stated by the gentleman who last spoke, to compel those sending freight for long distances to pay precisely the same amount per mile as those sending for shorter distances. Now, it is well known to-day that cattle trains and cars from the West and from the South carry their freight at very low rates, which renders it possible to ship those cattle, renders it possible to have a connection between the markets of New York and the stock-raisers of Texas, Minnesota, and Kansas. So with wheat. At a very low rate a train of cars is loaded in the extreme West and sent to New York City, sent to the eastern seaboard. This through-freight trade is a great wholesale freight trade, these low rates rendering this trade possible. And to-day in this measure it is proposed to reduce the rates of the short lines and inevitably increasing them on the long through lines, so that it will be impossible to maintain this great through trade. The rates of freight imposed under the operation of this law would be so great that the shipments would be impossible at any living rates to the producer. That is the practical question. These immense through trains at low rates have grown up in a natural way. I grant that there are evils in that direction we should remedy, but this bill does not remedy them.

I could wish, Mr. Speaker, we had a system of general law to regulate railroad corporations and furnish distinct rules to govern those companies. I wish there were penalties to-day to punish the watering of stocks, the pooling of profits, and the dishonest bargains with express companies. I wish we had a law to-day to regulate those transactions by which it has been rendered almost impossible to build railroads. I wish we had a law at once to protect stockholders and the patrons of the roads, a system of universal railroad law for our interstate commerce. This bill professes to be in that direction. But, Mr. Speaker, this bill is not such a bill; it is a bill which those who present it seem unable to explain. This bill proposes, as I say, to render it impossible to ship freight over a great and continuous line through many States by compelling the roads to carry local traffic at the same rate.

Let me give a single comparison. To-day you may travel from Minnesota on one of those coupon tickets and get that through ticket for about twice as much or twice and a half as much as you would have to pay in crossing a single State, and you will cross six or seven States. Why not then pass a law forbidding any company to charge less in proportion for those through tickets than for a ticket across a single State? It would be equally just, it would be equally practicable. And in calling the attention of the House to this bill, so far as it affects the rebates, I favor it. The section to put an end to eveners I favor. There is a legitimate object in the bill. But so far as it professes to compel a railroad company to charge the same rates going from Minnesota to New York, or from Kansas to Philadelphia, as across a little line between two towns in Ohio and Indiana, the bill is not a practicable one. It would cripple the interests of the country and would directly interfere with the commerce of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to consume time. Other gentlemen desire to address the House. When the bill comes before us for debate under the five-minute rule I shall probably call your attention to its details. I speak now merely to call the attention of the House to those salient facts connected with the measure. I hope when we get through with it if we find that we cannot mature a measure that will justly commend itself to us, we will send this bill back to the committee from whence it came to mature a measure for which we can justly and safely vote, a bill intelligently framed and that does not couple good with objectionable propositions.

I desire to refer to a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] the other day. He said the oil export trade amounted to I think some $60,000,000, and wished this protection so as to get lower rates.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; not lower rates. I said distinctly that no producer of oil objected to paying the schedule rate, $1.50 per barrel; but I said he did object to paying $1.50 on his oil when the men in the "ring" shipped from the same point to the same point and got $1.10 of rebate or drawback. That is what I said.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will simply state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that an interest which amounts to $60,000,000 annually can always command just terms from the transportation companies of the world. And when he comes here and states that a trade amounting to $60,000,000 cannot get as good terms as anybody else, I doubt it very much. I think, as I have already stated, that this is a bill which ought to be weighed very carefully, and I hope it will not pass in its present condition, and that those who urge it will permit it to be amended so as to strike out the objectionable features, and consent that it be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. BRAGG. I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt Congress has the power to enact this or any other legislation to regulate commerce among the States and I am for any necessary, well-considered measure to that end, but I am not in favor of every proposition that may be offered touching this subject, and I will state that I am not satisfied with this bill, for while the objects to be attained in the main, as explained by its friends, are desirable, I cannot say that the bill will accomplish those objects; especially I am not clear as to the effect of the fourth section, in connection with other sections, and with all due respect to the committee that reported the bill, it appears to me that a half dozen lawyers or others might read it and no two of them would agree as to what it means. So far as its object is to prevent discrimination against one or more shippers to the advantage of another shipper, I am in favor of it, for I am satisfied that such favoritism is injurious, not only to the shippers, but to the whole people. So far as it undertakes to destroy competition between parallel routes, either railway or water routes, (if that is it effect,) I am against it.

I recollect, Mr. Speaker, in the first session of the Forty-third Congress, in 1874 a bill reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals through its then chairman, Mr. McCrary, now Secretary of War, to regulate commerce among the States, was discussed for weeks and finally passed the House to sleep in committee in the Senate. Its provisions were in the main different from the provisions of this bill, and met the active opposition of at least some gentlemen who are as yet quiet in opposing this bill. Its provisions were discussed by the press and people all over the country and its passage quite generally demanded.

I do not find that this bill has been generally discussed anywhere, nor is it generally known throughout the country that it is pending. It has been discussed for two hours only in this House, and I suppose that the gentleman from Texas, in charge of the bill, desires to pass it to-day. I hope he will not press it to a vote or seek to put it on its passage until it has been discussed for at least a week or ten days. It is certainly of more importance than any bill now pending in the House, and we should, I feel sure, regret to wake up after it is passed and find that it is a bill that favors monopoly instead of preventing it.

Sir, the gentleman from Texas says that there is $30,000,000,000 in value of products transported upon these lines annually. And it is folly to think about rushing a bill through this House affecting such vast interests and the whole people in a single day, especially when it is recollected that there are but few members who have a practical knowledge respecting the detail of this large carrying trade. I trust it will be fully considered, discussed, and amended before it is sought to put it upon its passage. I, for one, will not vote for a bill of this magnitude until I at least think I understand how it will operate.

Mr. BRAGG. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the great corporations of our time few things seem more curious than the provision in the Constitution that forbids the creation by the States of orders of nobility. Our fathers who formed this Government were so anxious to prevent privileged classes that they forbade entailed estates and hereditary distinctions in every form. A man in the service of this Government cannot even accept an honorary badge from any foreign ruler without the consent of Congress. Yet beginning as our fathers did with the absolute prohibition of all privileged classes we have gone on year by year creating a classs of artificial creatures which never die and permitting them to consolidate themselves until we have to-day in the United States a class of great corporations each of which controls a territory vaster than the domain of many a prince and exercises powers greater than those of any noble. These great artificial creatures are not subject to casualties or death; they are not subject to human infirmities; they never die, they never become incompetent to exercise power. On the contrary, they go on year by year accumulating capital and force until to-day some of them reach across the continent and more or less control the selection of every member of Congress and of every member of the State Legislature along their routes.

It is, indeed, a curious subject for reflection that, determined as the founders of our Government were that there should be in these States no privileged class, we should yet have built up among us the greatest and the most dangerous aristocracy that exists anywhere on the face of the earth. And now, when these artificial creatures have become so great and powerful, it is not strange that means should be sought for to put some check upon their action.

There have been several bills to regulate the great railroad companies introduced into Congress of late years. They were first proposed in republican Congresses. I confess to some surprise to see one now come into a democratic Congress, reported by one of its principal committees. It shows how things are changing politically as well as otherwise.

I quite understand, sir, that the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States; but if, under that power, Congress may assume to regulate the charges that a carrier may make for transporting goods from Alexandria to Washington, or between any other points not within the same State, then this power is more dangerous than it has been heretofore supposed to be.

Mr. REAGAN. There is nothing in the bill that says that or anything like it.

Mr. POTTER. Not which says that exactly, but which asserts a power that may be extended to the case I stated.

Mr. REAGAN. It will be time enough to oppose a bill of that kind when it is reported.

Mr. POTTER. This bill says what the carrier shall not charge. But if Congress can lawfully say to a common carrier in interstate trade what he may not charge, how can it then be logically said that Congress could not have the power to say what the carrier shall charge? Now, I am one of those who recognize fully the danger of these corporations. It seems to me one of the unwisest things that could have occurred, in a republican government, to have permitted them to grow up to their present dimensions; but if Congress can, under the power to regulate commerce, say what the great carriers shall charge or shall not charge, the result would, I fear, be an evil greater even than any that now exists from the action of these companies. For such action by Congress would be likely to end at last in these great companies controlling the legislation of Congress about them. We had better leave the correction of these evils to the States that created these companies and where they belong than to set about regulating them here.

Mr. KENNA. What provision in this bill states what shall be charged or not charged by persons, corporations, or others engaged in transportation?

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, there are no figures in this bill, nothing but a declaration that it shall be unlawful for any corporation to charge more for freight transported within a State than for freight transported or through lines.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman misconceives the bill entirely.

Mr. POTTER. What is your understanding of it?

Mr. KENNA. When I have the floor in my own right I will undertake to state what I understand the bill to mean. And I would advise gentlemen to read the bill themselves, in order that they might not be obliged to call on me for my understanding of it.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman interrupted me and I yielded courteously to him, and when he said that I was mistaken as to the meaning of the bill I courteously asked him what his understanding of it was that I might address myself to his statement, and so avoid discussion about the meaning of the bill. I will now yield to the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee reporting this bill, to state what he understands to be the effect of the provisions of this bill. I do not wish in any way to misstate its effect.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill provides that on the same road, not on different roads, or at least on the same line of haul, be it composed of many or few roads, a greater amount shall not be charged for a shorter distance than for a longer distance. There is nothing else in the bill. It does not undertake to provide any particular rate of freight.

Mr. POTTER. No, but it does in effect exactly that; it says that you shall not charge more for a longer distance than for a shorter distance.

Mr. REAGAN. No; shall not charge more for a shorter distance than for a longer distance.

Mr. POTTER. That is what I should have said and meant to say. I inverted the words.

Mr. BRIGHT. Here is the language: "any greater freight for a shorter than for a longer distance."

Mr. POTTER. Yes; you shall not charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance. Now, my difficulty is this: if Congress has the power to do that, then it has the power to make kindred regulations and to say that these common carriers shall not charge more than so much for such a distance or such a service.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POTTER. For what purpose?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. This bill provides for more than that.

Mr. POTTER. Yes; I understand that to be as the gentleman from Georgia says, and if I do not yield to him now to have this made plain it is only because I have not the time.

Whatever the particular restrictions of this bill, it remains that if the Congress of the United States has the power to say that a common carrier shall be controlled as to his charges in one respect, then Congress necessarily has the power to say that he shall be controlled as to his charges in other respects.

Mr. KENNA. No, because one may be right and the other may be wrong.

Mr. POTTER. Ah, that is where the measure might address itself to the discretion of Congress; but the power must exist for both purposes if it exist at all, and that is what I object to. I do not say the particular provisions of this bill would be unwise if Congress had the clear power to make such provisions. I only say it would be a dangerous power to be exercised by Congress at all, and not, I think, within its province.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman hold that the States can regulate interstate commerce? And if not, does he hold that these corporations shall, without any restraint or regulation, control the whole commerce of the country?

Mr. POTTER. I say that the States can control the corporations which they create; those corporations are their creatures and the States can control them. But it is not a question whether there is any other remedy or not, but whether Congress has the power contended for and whether it be not more dangerous for Congress to undertake to control these creatures which the States have authorized than to leave them to the restraints that the States and the courts can exercise over them. To my mind it is. I greatly fear that if Congress assumes to regulate such matters it will end in the control of Congress by these corporations. Pass this law, and I apprehend that it will soon be understood that no man living on the lines of one of these great railroads can expect to be elected to Congress unless he is committed to act as to these regulations of trade as these great companies may require.

Mr. REAGAN. That is where we are to-day.

Mr. THOMPSON. How does the gentleman propose to regulate commerce among the States.

Mr. POTTER. I cannot tell the gentleman in the two or three minutes I have. But I say that if the power to regulate commerce among the States extends to the power of Congress to say to a common carrier that he shall charge only so much for a certain service, or that he shall not discriminate in his charges according to his own will and his agreement with his customers, then this power to regulate commerce may be extended to other commercial transactions, and will enable Congress at its good pleasure to put a tariff on every service, and so control our interstate commercial transactions as even to granting monopolies of the sales of commodities to persons without the State; for if Congress can control bargains as to the carriage of goods why may it not as to their sale? I say that would be a great deal more dangerous than to leave the evil complained of where it is, and to the powers, State and judicial, that can exercise control over it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does the gentleman hold that the State of New York can pass such a law as this to regulate its own commerce?

Mr. POTTER. Oh, yes, so far as concerns the common carriers and the corporations it has created.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then, is there any authority except in Congress to regulate commerce between the States?

Mr. POTTER. I do not know of anybody that has power to regulate commerce between the States except the Congress of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then you admit the power but decline to exercise it.

Mr. POTTER. I do not admit the right of Congress to regulate commerce in the way proposed by this bill. It would be an exercise of that power without precedent, and I think as dangerous as novel.

Mr. THOMPSON. But for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce——

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman hold that the power to regulate interstate commerce means that Congress has the power to say that a common carrier shall charge only so much?

Mr. THOMPSON. This bill does not fix any rate or charge.

Mr. POTTER. It does indirectly, for if Congress has power to say what he shall not charge, it is in effect to limit and determine what he shall charge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for general debate has now expired. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment under the five-minute rule. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who has charge of this bill, has some amendments to offer from the Committee on Commerce. The amendments from that committee will be first acted upon.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall propose an amendment to section 4 when we reach that section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An amendment to that section will be in order when it is reached. The first section of the bill will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, in or about operating, running, or using any railroad or railway, or the carriage of any property on or by means of any railroad or railway or other means of transportation by common carriers, directly or indirectly to charge to, or receive from, any corporation, company, person, or party, any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward for the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any property carried, or to be carried, on or by any such railroad or railway, or other means of transportation by common carriers, and which is, or is to be, wholly or partly carried on or by such railroad or railway, or other means of transportation by common carriers, in, or as part of, one actually or substantially continuous carriage, from or to any foreign nation or country, into or from within any State or States, Territory or Territories, of the United States, or in or through two or more States or Territories of the United States, or from within one State or Territory of the United States into or through one or more other State or States, Territory or Territories, of the United States, than shall be received and retained from any other corporation, company, person, or party, for the same or substantially the same or similar act, service, or thing, acts, services, or things, respectively, done or performed, or which is or are to be, or should have been, done or performed, respectively, at the same or substantially the same time or times, or while the same schedule relating thereto, hereinafter provided for, shall be in force. Every corporation, company, receiver, trustee, and person acting or engaged as aforesaid shall afford and furnish the same and equally good, cheap, and expeditious advantages, services, means, and facilities for the carriage of all property entitled to be carried, and shall equally and as cheaply and expeditiously do and perform each and all acts, services and things in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or the carriage of all property which is, or is to be or shall have been, carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage, as aforesaid; and for, in, about, or connected with through rates of freight, compensation, or reward, and for, in, about, or connected with any carrying connection, or any receipt, delivery, wharfage, or storage, and in all other respects, as is, are, or shall be afforded or furnished or done for, in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storage, or carriage, respectively, of any other property of the same or substantially the same, or similar kind, when said acts, services, and things, respectively, are furnished, done, or performed, or are to be, or should be, or should have been furnished, done, or performed, respectively, at the same or substantially the same time or times, or when the same schedule aforesaid in respect thereto is in force. No break, stoppage, or interruption in carriage, or any contract, arrangement, or understanding, or any act or acts, thing or things, shall prevent the carriage of any property from being, or being regarded as, actually and substantially one continuous carriage as aforesaid, unless such break, stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding, act or acts, thing or things, is or are, or was or were, for some practical purpose, and without intent to prevent such carriage from being, or being regarded as, actually or substantially continuous as aforesaid, and without intent to evade any provision of this act.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment, not as coming from the Committee on Commerce, but on my own motion, to line 8, of this section, to strike out the words, "other means of transportation by common carriers," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "ship, steamboat, or other vessel," so that it shall read as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, in or about operating, running, or using any railroad or railway, or the carriage of any property on or by means of any railroad or railway or ship, steamboat, or other vessel.

Objection has been made to the provisions of this section because, it is said, they might embrace wagon carriage. I have had no opportunity to consult with all my colleagues on the committee, but after consultation with a portion of them, who have no objection to this amendment, I propose it. I only do so to accommodate an accidental view, which, it seems to me, has no force, because this bill does not intend to regulate local commerce, only interstate commerce. Our purpose is to embrace the great lines of commerce and transportation. But to obviate this objection we propose, by the amendment, to limit the operation of the bill to railroads, ships, steamboats, or other vessels, so that no question can be raised about interference with wagon carriage.

Besides, the bill applies only to railroad freight amounting to not less than an ordinary load of a freight car, and to freight of not less than one ton when carried by other modes of conveyance; so that really there is no substantial difficulty about the matter.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman will have to make a corresponding amendment to other parts of the section.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, arguments in favor of the exercise by Congress of the power to regulate and control railway transportation have been furnished by those who oppose as well as by those who advocate this bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] who antagonized the entire bill has declared that the railroad monopolists are oppressive to the people of this country, and he also confessed that this power has grown so strong as to exercise supreme control in a State which ranks second in the Union in population and wealth. Well, sir, if this power has become so gigantic as to control large States of this Union, is it not necessary in order to preserve the Republic itself that we should test the question whether it is more powerful than the National Government?

The power of the great monopolies has assumed such stupendous proportions that the public welfare is being endangered by them. The railways hold to-day the internal commerce of this country in their hands. Four trunk lines, governed alone by their greed and avarice, impose a tax upon every furrow turned by the plow of the western farmer and upon every blow which is struck by the mechanic. Shall we sit supinely here and see such a power overriding State authority, ignoring and trampling upon private rights and arbitrarily exercise absolute dominion over the commerce of this land!

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] utterly failed to show wherein this bill is unconstitutional or is not such a measure as will meet the demand of the public welfare. His opposition to the bill seems to be based mainly on the absence of any railroad lobby manipulating this House against the bill, and therefore he fears it is favorable to their interests. Sir, if there is force in such an argument, may I not retort that if the railroads wish this bill passed their agents would be here in our corridors and lobbies urging its passage? Does my friend not know that but a short time ago the Pacific Railroad sinking-fund bill was acted upon and passed in this House in the absence of any railroad lobby? But he knows the case was different at the other end of the Capitol when that bill was pending there. Now, why does the lobby not likewise hang around this Hall when measures affecting railway companies are pending here? I think I can furnish a reply. In the first place it is well known that this is a democratic body, and the history of that party during the whole of its long life has demonstrated that in every contest between corporations and the people it has been true to the people. Furthermore, these corporations, knowing that the members of this House are chosen directly by the people and are familiar with their wants and sufferings, in all contests for power over the people may feel that their efforts to influence the action of the Representatives of the people will be in vain.

So, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend as long at least as the democratic party is in power here this House will not be molested by the lobbyist. But seriously, sir, do not let us be influenced by the fear of scarecrows, but, like conscientious and intelligent legislators, examine this bill; reject it if there is evil in it or pass it if it be a just and wise measure.

CHARACTER OF THE BILL.

The first three sections of this bill substantially embody the leading features of a bill introduced by myself early in the present session. They are intended to prevent discriminations and combinations against the general public, while by means of special contracts, &c., large advantages and privileges are granted to individuals and favorites. These sections are intended to enforce the common-law rule of equality between all shippers in price, privileges, and convenience. I find no objection urged against these sections, and all seem to regard them as important for the public interest.

The objections that have been made are mainly against the adoption of the fourth section. It substantially prohibits companies from charging more for carrying a short distance than they do for carrying a long distance—not per mile—but, for instance, they shall not charge more for carrying a car-load four hundred miles than for carrying a car-load eight hundred miles; they may charge as much for the short distance as they do for the long distance, but not any more.

OPPOSITION TO FOURTH SECTION.

I am not as well advised as I desire to be of the effect this section may have upon the long hauls from the West to the East. Finding some difference of opinion among good men as to the effect of this section and owing to the uncertainty in that regard in my own mind, I regret that it has been introduced in the bill, but would prefer that it had come up as a separate proposition. Still I do not share in the serious apprehension of those who think it will operate to the injury of persons who are interested in long hauls. In order however to avoid uncertainty on this point and to secure the remaining sections of the bill, to which I believe there is no serious opposition, I will vote to strike out the fourth section. I prefer that it should come up for consideration as an independent measure when the intricate questions it presents may receive the profound thought and searching investigation it merits.

The remarks I shall make now will relate chiefly to the first three sections. I trust they will be adopted with the sections prescribing penalties for violations of the provisions of the bill. They are of very deep importance to the producer and the consumer. Upon the fate of this bill largely hangs the question whether the four trunk lines which do the carrying between the East and West and, indeed, railway corporations generally are stronger than the power of the people. They have already proven themselves stronger than sovereign States, and now it remains to be seen if they are stronger than the National Government. If the decision is in their favor, then must we confess with humiliation that, although our fathers by courage and sacrifice made themselves free, yet their children of this generation have tamely submitted themselves to enslavement under the power of corporated capital.

During fifteen years past the legislation of this country has been largely in the interest of corporated organizations.

ONEROUS LEGISLATION.

So onerous has this legislation become to the masses that the people of all sections cry aloud for relief and demand that we shall turn back the tide of oppression emanating from this source. The New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroads, constituting the four trunk lines connecting the East and West, have seized upon the powers created by this legislation to levy heavy tribute upon the western farmer and the consumer of the East.

The people of the West feel the effect of this power more sensibly than those of any other section, for these roads have exercised the prerogative of marking up or marking down the price of wheat, corn, and provisions. The tariff rates that these roads arbitrarily fix for carrying grain and provisions are prominent among the causes which produce fluctuations in the price of these products in the boards of trade

IMMENSITY OF INTERNAL OVER FOREIGN COMMERCE.

If we examine the statistics we shall find that our internal commerce has in recent years greatly outgrown our foreign commerce. In a report published by order of this House, prepared by Mr. Joseph Nimmo, chief of the bureau of internal commerce, I find that, during the year 1876, 83 per cent. of all the grain receipts of the Atlantic seaports was by rail. And it is said that 90 per cent. of all the commerce between the West and the seaboard is now carried over the great trunk railroads. I quote the following statement entire from Mr. Nimmo's report:

> The relative importance of internal and of foreign commerce may be inferred from the following comparative statements:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Estimated value of shipping (American and foreign) employed in our foreign trade | $200,000,000 |
> | Estimated value of the railroads of the United States | 4,600,000,000 |
> The value of the commodities embraced in our foreign commerce and the estimated value of commodities transported on railroads are as follows:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Value of imports and exports, (foreign commerce) | $1,121,634,277 |
> | Estimated value of commodities transported on rail, (internal commerce) | 18,000,000,000 |
> It appears from these estimates that the value of the railroads of the country is about twenty-three times the value of the shipping engaged in our foreign trade, and that the value of our internal commerce on railroads is about sixteen times the value of our foreign commerce.
> It is to be observed that these comparative statements embrace the value of our entire foreign commerce, whereas the data in regard to internal commerce relate only to railroads. If it were possible to ascertain the value of the commerce between the different sections of the country on the ocean and Gulf and on the lakes, rivers, and other avenues of transportation, we should probably find that the total value of our internal commerce is at least twenty-five times greater than the value of our foreign commerce. But the average value per ton of the commodities composing the internal commerce of the country being very much less than the average value of the commodities composing our foreign commerce, it is evident that the tonnage of internal commerce (i. e., employment of the vehicles of transportation) bears a very much higher ratio to the tonnage of our foreign commerce than does the value of our internal commerce to the value of our foreign commerce. It is probable, therefore, that the tonnage transported on the various avenues of internal commerce is more than one hundred times greater than the tonnage composing our foreign commerce.

MAGNITUDE OF RAILROADS AND THEIR CONTROL OVER COMMERCIAL PROSPERITY.

Poor's Railroad Manual furnishes us with the information of the rapid growth of railroads during the past few years.

The number of miles of railroads in this country in 1867 and 1876 was as follows:

Number of miles in 1867	39,276
Number of miles in 1876	77,470
Increase of mileage in nine years	38,194
Percentage of increase	97.25

Now compare these figures with the progress of our population:

Population in 1867	36,353,099
Population in 1876	44,736,859
Increase in population	8,383,859
Percentage of increase	23.06

These figures show how much more rapidly the railroads have proportionately grown than the population of the country!

It has been ascertained that the gross earnings of the railroads in 1876 were $497,257,959. This vast sum was the amount of the tax paid by our people in that year to the railroad companies for transportation. It is not very far from being double the amount of the entire expenses of the National Government and the interest on the public debt for the last year.

The internal commerce, and, I may say, the prosperity of the country, is under the control of the railroad companies. By their power of indirect taxation the prosperity of the agricultural and the mechanical classes is brought under subjection to these companies. If such a power is left without check or control it will augment its strength to such proportions as to rival the powers of the Federal Government. Can the Republic long exist with a superior power in the same land? Is there danger that it may lose its attributes of democracy and become an oligarchy of corporate officials? I do not say there is such danger, but will it not be well to put guards out in that quarter?

That conservative and able paper the New York Nation has declared that—

> The locomotive is coming in contact with the framework of our institutions. In this country of simple government the most powerful centralizing force which civilization has yet produced must within the next score of years assume its relations to that political machinery which is to control and regulate it.

These organizations have no franchise, power, or vitality which does not rest upon the license of the Government. They have not one dollar of revenue which has not been drawn from the people; and yet there are those who tell us these creatures of the Government are stronger than their creator.

VALUE AND NECESSITY OF RAILWAYS.

I am no enemy of railroads. I fully recognize their value in the processes of civilization and of the development of our country. I concede their absolute necessity in the operations of commerce. I know full well how essential they are to the convenience and well-being of that great inland section where I have my home. Knowing this, I would not destroy or oppress them or place any unreasonable restrictions upon them; but because I find them to be one of the great agents of civilization, because I regard them as essential to the prosperity of my country in peace and indispensable in war, for these reasons, and in order that they may prove a blessing rather than a curse to the people, do I insist that they like all institutions in this land be placed under the control of law and that the people may not be afflicted with their unjust and arbitrary exactions.

The security and real prosperity of the railways themselves will be best promoted by being placed under the regulation and protection of law. Far better than to be left as now in a loose and uncertain condition, to battle with mobs, riots, and the horrors of the torch and bloodshed. If they are above and beyond the law should they not look to the higher law for protection in times of violence? Undoubtedly they will be better off under the regulation and protection of laws to which all in the name of the people shall yield. If these roads deal fairly and justly with the people and are operated for the public convenience and good, the people will be ready to yield to their reasonable demands, and will feel an interest in guarding them from danger as public institutions.

ABUSES OF RAILWAYS.

Before entering upon the discussion of the power of Congress under the Constitution to regulate and control railway interstate traffic I shall ask your attention to some of the abuses which exist and which the bill I introduced was intended to cure.

COMBINATION DESTROYS COMPETITION.

Many have believed that competition would prevent railroad monopoly, but it has time and again been demonstrated that by means of combinations, pooling, &c., competition is avoided and lines of transportation can strangle commerce, consume its profits, and tax it beyond endurance. George Stephenson, the father of the railway system of Great Britain, asserted that "wherever combination is possible competition is impossible."

The four great trunk lines to which I have alluded often combine to establish rates of freight, and by means of pooling their earnings for distribution among themselves on an agreed basis avoid competition and obtain complete mastery over shippers. They decide for themselves what part of the produce of the West and profits of the eastern dealers they will demand and take. The western farmer and the merchant are helpless in the hands of these greedy and avaricious corporations.

These roads have been clothed with exalted and valuable privileges for the public good and convenience, and should use them for that purpose, yet they use these privileges to prey upon the public and practice irritating and unjust discriminations against some shippers while granting to others the most extraordinary favors. Public privileges should be used in such a way as to do equal and exact justice to all. No discrimination or favoritism should be allowed, no partiality should be extended to one shipper over another. The privileges enjoyed by these corporations are borrowed from each and every individual in the states enfranchising them, and each and all parted with these privileges upon the implied compact that in their exercise all should be treated alike. That is the fundamental principle on which all public or quasi-public corporations, such as railroads, are endowed with the franchises they enjoy.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST THE PUBLIC.

How have these trunk lines in return for the favors received kept faith with the public? By means of special contract some shippers are given rates from 50 to 75 per cent. cheaper than those charged to the general public. Take for instance the pooled lines running between Chicago and New York. Lately they fixed their reduced rates as follows: on first class, 75 cents per hundred; second class, 60 cents per hundred; on third class, 50 cents per hundred, and 40 cents for fourth class. These are the rates the public are compelled to pay; but favored parties have been given contracts by these lines running through the year at 25 cents per hundred for all classes. This is the kind of equality before the law meted out to the great mass of the people of Illinois and the Northwest.

But I will go farther east for an instance. The people generally are required to pay for rates on the New York Central, from New York to Syracuse, 50 cents on first class, 40 cents on second class, 34 cents on third class, and 23 cents on fourth class. But favored dealers are given contracts by which all classes of goods are carried for 12 cents per hundred. I obtain these figures from the report of the committee on railroad transportation of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and of course their correctness cannot be impeached.

A merchant of the highest credit in Evansville, Indiana, informed me during last summer that notwithstanding the rates charged the public for a certain class of freight from Boston to Evansville in 1877 were 90 cents per hundred, yet he had succeeded by special contract in obtaining a reduction on his own freight during that year between those points to 45 cents per hundred.

OUTRAGES OF THE EVENERS.

Another of the great abuses by which the public, and especially Western cattle dealers, have been plundered, results from a combination known as "Eveners." It illustrates one of the evils against which the three first sections of this bill is directed, and which I believe will be cured by their operation.

A description of the "evener" process of extortion is given in a pamphlet recently published by J. F. Rushing, at pages 3 and 4:

These roads, (all the great trunk lines except perhaps the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad,) when united, have practically no competition, for they alone reach out and take the cattle off of the cheap pasture lands and set them down in the eastern markets. But if not united the competition between these four roads would certainly reduce the cost of this transportation to a proper figure. In order to destroy this competition and keep up high rates of transportation it was only necessary for these roads, or a majority of them, to agree upon a rate of transportation and agree to supply stock-cars only at the yards of certain large stock-dealers at the great shipping points in the West. Accordingly, the railroad officials and the owners of stock-yards, from which the farmer and drover of the West can alone ship cattle east, have organized an association and placed the power to control this trade in the hands of select men called "eveners." We have, then, the railroads, the great stock-yards, and the "eveners," who are parties to an agreement that robs the producer and the consumer of meat by maintaining the cost of its transportation at twice the cost on any other article. It is done in this way: the railroads agree—

First. To charge $115 per car on all live stock shipped from Chicago or Saint Louis to New York, and this is paid of course by the owner of the stock.

Second. The railroads agree to pay to the "eveners" $15 for each car of stock shipped from any point West to New York, and this without regard to whether the stock is shipped from the yards of the men belonging to the association or not.

Third. The net sum received by the roads belonging to the association (that is, $100 per car) is pooled and the sum total is divided between the roads without any reference to the number of cars actually transported by each.

The men who belong to this association make annually the sum of $1,000,000 on the $15 per car that is charged over and above the $100 that is retained by the railroad companies. In addition to this they receive $1,000,000 on the hay and grain given to the stock more than they are justly entitled to; and in addtion to this they have a clean profit over all legitimate cost of $500,000 per year for yardage.

Discriminations like these paralyze commerce and most flagrantly oppress producers of the West and consumers of the East.

LARGE ROADS OPPRESS SMALLER ROADS.

But individuals and private shippers are not the only classes injuriously affected by discriminations and combinations. The smaller and weaker railroads are also often victimized and oppressed by their more powerful rivals or by combinations of two or more companies.

I could, if I had time, cite in detail instances illustrating this point, but will content myself with the general statement of the abuse in a case within my knowledge, where two railroad companies, running between two important points, competing for freights in territory common and open alike to both—one of these companies entered into a special contract or conspiracy with the only line furnishing an outlet east of the terminal point of the two roads first alluded to, whereby the road discriminated against was driven out of competition on through freight and an absolute monopoly was created for the rival line in the territory from which the freights were drawn.

The plan resorted to for the accomplishment of this result is as follows: the sole line furnishing the eastern outlet formed a contract with the favored company by which a rate of charges is based on the length of haul by such road, or a through rate per ton per mile, while it charges the rival company, and only competitor in the country contributary to these roads an arbitrary or local rate much higher than the through rate per ton per mile charged the other road, and, in fact, so high as to effectually prohibit the receiving of such through freight by the company discriminated against.

I will not weary you with further details of the injustice practiced on the public by discriminations, combinations, &c. Enough is shown and enough is doubtless known by members and the country to warrant congressional interference for the correction of these evils.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE INTERSTATE TRAFFIC.

I am not an advocate of the policy of the Government running and operating railroads on its own account. In addition to the extravagance and expense which would be entailed, an army of officials would be created whose political power would endanger the liberties of the people, and bands of plunderers might be generated under such governmental management like that of the Credit Mobilier. What I believe the country needs is that wise laws shall be enacted to so regulate the railway system that it shall not be used as an engine of oppression and an element of discord among the people.

The right of Congress to enact such laws is unquestionable. Happily for us, although the advancement of science and mechanical improvements had not brought to the knowledge of those who laid the foundation of the Government these instruments of commerce, yet they placed in the Constitution a provision which confers on Congress ample power to make all necessary laws for the purpose of regulating and controlling any and all channels of commerce among States, either natural or artificial. Section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, declares that—

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

Railroads are merely channels of commerce running on and across State lines and "among States."

This bill contains, in my judgment, considerable unnecessary verbiage and technicality; yet it should not be rejected for that reason. It is simply declaratory of the common law and is the exertion of a constitutional power conferred on Congress. It seeks to apply well-established common-law principles for the protection of the public from the extortions of a monster institution which has sprung into existence of late years and which is exerting an enormous influence upon the commercial and political aspects of society, an institution which finds a superior force nowhere except it be in the strong arm of the National Government. I cannot conceal my surprise that two such able lawyers as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] question the power of Congress to legislate for the regulation of interstate commerce.

CONSTITUTION ADOPTED TO CREATE THE POWER.

Why, sir, the want of power under the Articles of Confederation "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" was one of the leading defects our fathers found under the confederation, and probably as much as any one cause conduced to the establishment of the Constitution.

Judge Story in his Commentary upon the Constitution (section 259) draws a picture of the deplorable condition of commerce at that period, which bears a marked resemblance to the present situation so far as interstate commerce is concerned. Story writes that—

The want of any power in Congress to regulate foreign or domestic commerce was deemed a leading defect in the confederation. This evil was felt in a comparatively slight degree during the war; but when the return of peace restored the country to its ordinary commercial relations the want of some uniform system to regulate them was early perceived; and the calamities which followed our shipping and navigation, our domestic as well as our foreign trade, convinced the reflecting that ruin impended upon these and other vital interests unless a national remedy could be devised. We accordingly find the public papers of that period crowded with complaints on this subject. It was indeed idle and visionary to suppose that while thirteen independent States possessed the exclusive power of regulating commerce there could be found any uniformity of system or any harmony and co-operation for the general welfare. Measures of a commercial nature which were adopted in one State from a sense of its own interests would be often countervailed or rejected by other States from similar motives.

Mr. Webster confirms the statement that this was one of the main causes which induced the establishment of our present Constitution, (see Webster's Works by Curtis, volume 1, page 103,) in which he said "maritime defense, commercial regulation, and national revenue were laid at the foundation of the national compact. They are its leading principles and the cause of its existence. They were primary considerations not only with the convention which framed the Constitution, but also with the people when they adopted it. They were the objects, and the only important objects, to which the States were confessedly incompetent. To effect these by means of a national government was the constant, prevalent, the exhaustless topic of those who favored the adoption of the Constitution."

NECESSITY AND MEANING OF THE POWER.

Mr. Story in his work referred to, in speaking of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, says it "is a power vital to the prosperity of the Union, and without it the Government would scarcely deserve the name of National Government and would soon sink into discredit and imbecility. It would stand as a mere shadow of sovereignty to mock our hopes and involve us in a common ruin." (See section 1057.) He defines the meaning of this constitutional provision in the following clear and explicit language, (section 1061,) in discussing the meaning of the clause "to regulate commerce:"

Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more. It is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

Further on he remarks that—

The power over navigation and over commercial intercourse was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their Government, and it is impossible that the convention should not have understood the word "commerce" as embracing it. Indeed, to construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would defeat the very object for which it was introduced into the Constitution.—Section 1062.

The learned commentator further remarks in sections 1065 and 1066 of his work, that—

This power the Constitution extends to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes. * * * The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. It does not indeed comprehend any commerce which is purely internal, between man and man, in a single State or between different parts of the same State, and not extending to or affecting other States. Commerce among the States means commerce which concerns more States than one. It is not an apt phrase to indicate the mere interior traffic of a single State. The completely internal commerce of a State may be properly considered as reserved to the State itself. * * * The importance of the power of regulating commerce among the States for the purposes of the Union is scarcely less than that of regulating it with foreign states.

The Supreme Court of the United States has in a number of decisions held that the power to regulate commerce among the States belongs to Congress and that this power is exclusive in the Government of the United States. It is not claimed by any one that this power extends to the internal commerce of a State.

RAILROADS ARE PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

Some authorities base the right of legislative control over railroads upon the theory that they are public highways and as such are subject to public control. In Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company vs. Smith, the supreme court of Illinois held that "railways are improved public highways," and in Olcott vs. Board of Supervisors of Fond du Lac County the Supreme Court of the United States held:

It is the purposes and uses of a work which determine its character. Whether the use of a railway is a public or private one depends in no measure upon who constructed it or who owns it. It has never been considered a matter of importance that the road was built by the agency of a private corporation. No matter who is the agent the function performed is that of the State. Though the ownership is private the use is public. So turnpikes, bridges, ferries, and canals, although made by individuals under public grant or by companies, are regarded as publici juris.

The railways have in fact superseded all other highways so far as the carrying of 83 per cent. of the entire internal commerce of the country is concerned.

This power can also be well maintained on the ground that the same sovereignty which gives railroad companies the right of eminent domain or the right to drive a citizen from his home and deprive him of what at common law is his castle and use it for public purposes certainly has the power to regulate and control these companies in their use of this property. If no such power to regulate exists, they may in addition to depriving the citizen of his home deprive him of all else that he enjoys. Can you name a more eminent living authority than Judge Cooley upon questions of this character? He has said:

I do not understand that the right of eminent domain can be exercised on behalf of private parties or corporations, unless the State permitting it reserves to itself a right to supervise and control the use by such regulation as shall insure to the public the benefit promised thereby and as shall preclude the purpose which the public had in view in authorizing the appropriation being defeated by partiality or unreasonable selfish action on the part of those who only on the ground of public convenience and welfare have been suffered to make the appropriation.—People vs. Township Board of Salem, 20 Mich., 483.

The right of eminent domain being a sovereign power is inalienable, and it would seem to follow that the right to supervise and control the use for which private property is taken by virtue of the sovereign power of the State is also inalienable.

POWER GIVEN BY EXPRESS LANGUAGE OF THE CONSTITUTION.

But, sir, the position is impregnable that in addition to common-law principles Congress derives this power from the express language of the Constitution. In the common law we find the right of legislative control because these roads are common carriers and partake of the nature of public institutions. The bill is, as I have already stated, simply declaratory of the common law, and only seeks by exercising power expressly conferred by the constitution to remove any difficulty that may exist in applying these principles to railroads, and in this it performs one of the great offices of statutes in this country that is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances.

DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

I shall call your attention now to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which answer every doubt and close the mouth of every caviler and quibbler. In the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered in the Granger cases, March 1, 1877, of Munn & Scott vs. The people of the State of Illinois, 4 Otto, 113, Chief-Justice Waite said:

This brings us up to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to common law, from whence come the rights which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only. This was said by Lord Chief-Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago in his treatise De Portibus Maris, and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control.

After quoting Lord Hale as to ferries and wharfingers, and the decision of the supreme court of Alabama, because the court thought they found in them the principle which supports the legislation they were examining, the opinion continues as follows:

"Enough has already been said to show that when private property is devoted to a public use it is subject to public regulation."

Look at the decisions which I shall now quote and see how clearly this power is defined and recognized. Some of these decisions are old and some are new. They are solemn announcements of the bench when occupied by as profound jurists as this country has produced. I challenge and defy the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to produce a single adjudication of the Supreme Court contravening this doctrine.

In the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton 1, 196, Chief-Justice Marshall, in pronouncing the decision of the court, said:

We are now arrived at the inquiry, what is this power? It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

On page 229, of same report, he said:

Commerce, in its simplest signification, means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations, become the objects of commercial regulation. Ship-building, the carrying trade, and propagation of seamen, are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess power to regulate commerce.

That such was the understanding of the framers of the Constitution is conspicuous from provisions contained in that instrument.

In Brown vs. State of Maryland, 12 Wheaton, 419, 446, Chief-Justice Marshall says:

"What, then, is the just extent of a power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States?

"This question was considered in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat. Rep., 1, in which it was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution. The power is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot be stopped at the external boundary of a State, but must enter its interior."

In the City of New York vs. Mills, 11 Peters, 102, 157, Mr. Justice Story says:

"It has been argued that the power of Congress to regulate commerce is not exclusive, but concurrent with that of the States. If this were a new question in this court, wholly untouched by doctrine or decision, I should not hesitate to go into a full examination of all the grounds upon which concurrent authority is attempted to be maintained. But in point of fact the whole argument on this very question, as presented by the learned counsel on the present occasion, was presented by the learned counsel who argued the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton R., 1; and it was then deliberately examined and deemed inadmissible by the court. Mr. Chief-Justice Marshall, with his accustomed accuracy and fullness of illustration, reviewed at that time the whole grounds of the controversy; and from that time to the present, the question has been considered (as far as I know) to be at rest. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, has been deemed exclusive, from the nature and objects of the power, and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise. Full power to regulate a particular subject, implies the whole power and leaves no residuum; and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part."

In Corfield vs. Coryell, (4 Wash., Cir. C. R., 344–378,) as early as 1823, Justice Washington remarked:

Commerce with foreign nations and among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those States for purposes of trade, be the object of trade what it may, and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage overland through the States, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States. It is this intercourse which Congress is invested with the power of regulating and with which no State has a right to interfere.

In the case of The State Freight Tax, (15 Wallace, 282, 275,) the Supreme Court of the United States held as follows:

"The transportation of freight or of the subjects of commerce is a constituent part of commerce itself. A tax upon freight transported from State to State is a regulation of commerce among the States.

"Whenever subjects, in regard to which a power to regulate commerce is asserted, are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they are exclusively within the regulating control of Congress.

"Transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State or from one State to another is of this nature.

"Hence a statute of a State imposing a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up without the State and brought within it, is repugnant to that provision of the Constitution of the United States which ordains that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

The questions arose in respect to the power to thus tax railroad companies as well as other parties, and the decision is applicable, therefore, to the question of means of transport (Post, II of this point) as well as to the question of general power.

Mr. Justice Strong, in pronouncing the opinion of the court, says:

"Beyond all question the transportation of freight or of the subjects of commerce for the purpose of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired. The power was given by the same words and in the same clause by which was conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the State to the buyer or from the place of production to the market was not contemplated, for without that there could be no consummated trade, either with foreign nations or among States. In his work on the Constitution Judge Story asserts that the sense in which the word 'commerce' is used in that instrument includes not only traffic, but intercourse and navigation. And in the Passenger Case it was said: 'Commerce consists in selling the superfluity, in purchasing articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures, in buying from one nation and selling to another, or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight.' Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or water. In either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. Among the States it must have been principally by land when the Constitution was adopted."

I shall make but one further quotation, although I have references to many other decisions in the same direction. I will now invite your attention to the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge, 1 Woolworth, 150. The case arose in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa. The questions were with respect to an act of Congress of February 17, 1867, as to a bridge erected by a railroad company across the Mississippi River at Clinton, Iowa. In commenting upon the act, Judge Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the case, said:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water; and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States" spoken of in the Constitution must at the time that instrument was adopted have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted, a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has with great benefit been subjected to the control of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that when these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States, and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of that commerce again to the control of the States, and to all the consequent vexations and burdens which the States may impose through whose territories it must be carried on? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?

For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become a part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

Upon the appeal of this case to the Supreme Court of the United States, the decision of the circuit court was affirmed. (The Clinton Bridge, 10 Wall., 454, 462.)

I will not consume the time of the House in quoting from numerous other cases that I have collated from decisions of English courts and the courts of this country clearly establishing the doctrine that railways, being common carriers, have no right to make unjust discriminations, but are bound to carry for all persons or companies at the same rate under the same circumstances. The charge must be the same for all freights of like kind, class, and quality, for like services. And that in all these matters they are subject to the control of the political department. It is contrary to public policy to allow discriminations against particular companies or persons or to permit these "highways of commerce" to grant exclusive privileges to others in order to secure monopolies to themselves.

Enough authorities have been cited to show the power of Congress to enact this law. But, sir, independent of authorities, this power is inherent in the Government. In truth, the Government would be a failure without it. The great right of self-preservation of the Republic furnishes the power and the public welfare demands its assertion.

ARE CORPORATIONS STRONGER THAN THE REPUBLIC?

Some seem to think that railway corporations are hedged around by a divinity too sacred for the Legislature to touch. Who placed them above and beyond the power of the Government? Have the people parted with their sovereignty by constitutional enactment? If so, show it to me! Has the legislative department shorn the people of their sovereignty and created a power greater than the republic? I deny that such a power has ever existed in the legislative department. The Legislature is not the sovereignty! Sovereignty resides alone with the people of the States. The power which has created these corporations is strong enough to regulate them.

When we find an institution in this land which has grown strong enough to deprive a citizen of his home against his will, which levies tribute upon his energies and toil, which successfully overrides the power of sovereign States, then, sir, we have reached the period when the combined powers of all the States, acting through the General Government, should be put in operation to subject this leviathan to restraint and regulation, lest it may regulate the National Government.

THIS QUESTION CAN BE IGNORED NO LONGER.

This question should be ignored no longer. It is too important to be driven out of Congress by sneers and quibbles. All admit the necessity for some legislation on this subject.

If you go on record against this bill you cannot satisfy the country by laughing at its phraseology and by saying you did not understand it. You will be readily answered that if this bill as presented for your consideration is imperfect your solemn duty to the people requires that you should seek in their interest to perfect it. If you can improve this bill, and thereby more securely protect the public, you will find no justification for your neglect to do so by saying that no railroad lobby was here fighting the bill. I, for one, am happy to see the day when we can sit here as law-makers freed from the corrupting influence of lobbyists. Let us take hold of this question and dispose of it before the lobby arrives. Inaction on our part will be in the interest of corporations. They do not want any more legislation than they have already.

As I have said, for fifteen years the legislation of this country has been largely in their interest. The passage of the Pacific Railroad sinking-fund bill is a happy augury to the people that the course of congressional legislation has changed. The passage of that act over the determined, stubborn opposition of the most potential corporations in this land is a glorious achievement of which this Congress can justly boast. It stands out in bold relief as proof of the wisdom, integrity, and fidelity of the Forty-fifth Congress. It will contribute as largely as any law it can make to vindicate this Congress from the assaults of its slanderers.

TRUNK LINES FATTENED ON THE LABOR OF THE WEST.

Let us follow up this good act with another very much needed. The great West, far away from the sea-port markets, is compelled to send the fruit of the labor of its toiling millions mainly over the four trunk lines of transportation. Its industrious people are tired of yielding the profit of their toil to these corporations. They have seen Vanderbilt gather a hundred millions, mainly coined from the sweat of their brow. They have seen the directors and officers of the Erie road become millionaires out of their hard earnings. They have seen the Pennsylvania Central grow strong enough to own, as has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, and control lines running into eleven States of the Union and have a traffic of 8½ per cent. of all the railroads in the United States. And they have seen the Baltimore and Ohio fatten upon the profits of their energy.

TAX ON MEAT AND BREAD.

But this relief is not asked alone for the West, it is needed as well for the consumer of the East. These corporations place an onerous tax on meat and bread. Why in this day of abundant harvest have men and women starved in the eastern cities? Was this suffering increased because bread was too high for them to obtain?

It has often been urged in the past that the evils complained of would work out their own cure and therefore the law-maker should not interfere, but, sir, these predictions have not been verified. On the contrary the evils have grown apace and have become more and more burdensome. As soon as the trunk lines have laid aside one device they resort to another more subtle and more oppressive to the public.

SEPARATE STATE ACTION INEFFECTUAL.

Effort has been made in several States to regulate railway traffic and prevent these evils. While some relief has thus been obtained their efforts have in the main proved abortive, because of a lack of concert among the States, a want of similarity in the laws, and because State legislation can only operate within the boundaries of the State enacting the laws. Indeed our laws with regard to interstate railway traffic are but little if any better than the laws governing commerce under the confederation as described by Judge Story, which I have read to you.

As I have mentioned, one combination extends into eleven States; a person shipping over such a line in the absence of a national law regulating railroads is subjected to the liability, exemptions, and responsibilities of every State through which the shipment may pass. As State laws can only operate on portions of these great lines of transportation we need the exertion of an authority coextensive in its jurisdiction with these lines to regulate and control them. That authority can only be found in Congress.

THE DESIRE OF THE WEST.

What we of the West desire to accomplish is that we may have the use of these agencies of commerce, these highways of commerce, to carry our products to the eastern markets at as low rates as the railroad companies can afford by honest and economical management to carry them, and that all men shall stand upon an equality in the use and cost of the conveniences and facilities of these highways. The men of the West do not desire to do injustice to railroad companies or any class. It is far from their desire to destroy or cripple railway usefulness, for they fully appreciate how much the prosperity of the West is dependent upon the facilities afforded by them, and they are ever willing to pay a fair compensation for these facilities; but they want relief from the extortions of "eveners" and the exactions of all other plundering combinations.

Mr. Speaker, John Randolph of Roanoke, Story, Webster, and other statesmen and writers tell us that the want of power in the Federal Government to regulate commerce was one of the main causes which led to the formation and establishment of the present Constitution. If the progress and development of commerce, if the discoveries and improvements in arts and science have outgrown the power and fitness of the constitutional provision made by our fathers to regulate commerce and promote the welfare of the "greatest number," then I hope the people are yet wise and strong enough to so amend the Constitution that the National Government shall have power to compel corporations, no matter how great and powerful they may be, to yield obedience to law and do justice to all.

Mr. ERRETT. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, for more than twenty years the people of various sections of the country have been complaining that the railroad companies were discriminating against them in the rates of freight, and this complaint has grown louder and louder as the years have advanced until we find it here embodied in this bill, with a remedy against the recurrence of such an evil.

So long as the people who resided upon the navigable streams of the country had recourse to steamboats for transportation of their wares this evil of railroad discrimination was not so keenly felt; but gradually, slowly, and surely the steamboats have been driven by fierce competition from the rivers, until now there is scarcely a boat to be seen upon the western streams; and as they have dropped out of the carrying trade the railroads have come into a monopoly of the freight traffic, and have imposed upon all or nearly all the cities within their reach such rates of carriage as they chose to frame.

For a while the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers were competitors for the carrying trade; they are such no longer, whatever they may hereafter become. For a while, also, we had the Pennsylvania Canal, and it, with the New York canals, were brisk competitors for the traffic between the East and West; but the Pennsylvania Canal was purchased by a railroad company and destroyed as a through route by the abandonment of its western division, while the New York canals have been steadily dwindling in trade until they no longer pay the cost of maintenance. They can be kept up only by taxing the people for their support; and it is not likely that that course will long be submitted to. Practically, the whole carrying trade of the country is now in the hands of the railroad companies; and it behooves Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional privilege, to regulate commerce between the States, to step in and enact laws that will prevent these railroad companies from injuring the trade of any portion of the country by discriminating against it in the matter of railroad charges.

I hope that the next generation, if that sight is to be denied to this one, will wake up to the real value of our water-courses for transportation, and will learn to use them wisely as the cheapest and best highways of commerce. When the fever of the present day has abated and the national blood courses more coolly through the veins of the people they will learn what the people of Europe have already learned, to take hold of and improve every stream that will bear and carry a burden, and to supplement the streams with canals where streams are not available. Our rivers will then no longer run idly to the sea, as untamed and useless as the wild horses of the plains, as they do now; but until that era of good sense and sound judgment returns we are shut up to the necessity of regulating the commerce between the States upon the railroads which have secured a monopoly of it, and which exercise their unrestrained powers at their own unrestrained will, utterly regardless of the fatal results which may thereby follow to the commerce of certain parts of the country.

The discrimination in railroad rates, which is so bitterly and with so much good reason complained of, developed itself first when the struggle began between the trunk lines which stretch from the ocean to the West. There are now five of these lines, one from Portland, Maine, two from New York, one from Philadelphia, and one from Baltimore, while for near twenty years there have been four of them. All of these grasp for the trade of the West, and so eagerly that the president of one of them, Mr. J. Edgar Thompson, once characterized the struggle as "an insane competition." Insane it undoubtedly is and has been; and the insanity has been so long-continued as to become chronic and well-nigh incurable. The only remedy for it is the one proposed in this bill; and if Congress has in it the instincts of a good physician, it will apply the remedy with relentless vigor and promptitude.

The insanity of the rivalry of these trunk lines is shown in the fact that although railroads were originally built with capital invested for profit, and although that fact seems to have been entirely lost sight of, yet it takes a certain amount of money to operate them and keep them in good condition. This certain amount of money can be got only out of their earnings, and if their earnings fall short of their expenses they must become bankrupt. The actual cost of running and maintaining a railroad can be ascertained with mathematical exactness, and I will assume that it has been so ascertained. Assuming, then, that it costs 30 cents for every 100 pounds transported over a road from Chicago, or Saint Louis, or Milwaukee to New York, and that the railroads by a mutual agreement fix the rate at 40 cents per 100 pounds, it is clear that so long as that rate is kept up the roads will earn a fair margin of profit, and that they can moreover afford to carry 100 pounds from Pittsburgh to New York, just half the distance, for half that rate. All this is reasonable, sensible, and sane. But presently one of the five trunk lines fancies that it is not getting its share of the traffic, or that by a little finesse it can get more. So its agents slip quietly around and agree to carry for 35 cents instead of 40, or to carry 2,000 pounds as if they were but 1,750. No sooner does this fact become known (and it becomes known with the rapidity of commercial lightning) than the other four roads at once put down the rate to 30. The first road answers this by defiantly cutting the rates down to 25; and this defiance is answered by another reduction to 20.

It is evident to every one that not one of these roads can afford to do this. If it costs every one of them 30 cents to put down 100 pounds of freight in New York, every one of them must lose money on every 100 pounds they carry at rates below 30. To continue such a costly rivalry is the very insanity of competition, and Mr. J. Edgar Thompson had the clearness of vision necessary to characterize it properly.

But there is method in this madness, as there is in most other kinds of madness. The managers of these railroads see that if they must, in order to secure business at Chicago or elsewhere, carry freight at a loss, they can make it up by charging more to shippers at other points where shippers cannot help themselves. Thus, we will say that on the 1st of April last the rates mutually agreed upon by the five trunk lines was 40 cents per 100 pounds from Chicago to New York for fourth-class freight, and 20 cents from Pittsburgh to New York. So far all is fair, and the published schedules of the roads show no discrimination, or at least not enough to speak of. But when the rate falls to 20 in Chicago, it still remains at 20 in Pittsburgh. The published schedules are void as to Chicago and New York or any other terminal points, but they are rigidly adhered to in Pittsburgh and other intermediate points where there are no competing lines; and it has thus frequently happened that it cost more to ship a barrel of flour or a bushel of wheat from Pittsburgh to New York than from Chicago, although Pittsburgh is 420 miles nearer to New York than the latter.

So long, therefore, as the railroads are left to themselves so long will this discrimination continue. The people at intermediate points will be taxed severely to enable these roads to keep up this insane and ruinous competition between themselves. It is safe to say that in their present power to discriminate in this way lies their sole power to keep up this destructive warfare with each other. Remove this, deprive them of the power to charge more per mile from one place than another, and that moment you deprive them of the means of carrying on this insane competition. If an insane man in a hospital is found with a destructive weapon in his hands every instinct of self-preservation counsels the taking of it from him; and the removal of this weapon of discrimination from the railroads will forever deprive them of the power to carry on their fights with each other. The merchant who is forever losing soon becomes bankrupt; and a railroad which carries freight at a loss must break up.

I do not say that the discriminations alluded to have sufficed to make up to these roads their losses by cutting rates, for such is not the fact. They have served, however, to break the fall of the roads, and have postponed a bankruptcy which must sooner or later ensue. The stockholders and bondholders of these roads are all directly interested in putting a stop to this "insane" competition. I have the authority of one of the first railroad men in this country, a man largely interested in railroads, and one also who adds to his knowledge of engineering a long experience in railroading, for saying that if some such measure as this is not soon passed every one of the trunk lines will eventually find itself in the hands of a receiver. Why? Because, with all their discriminations, they are and have been carrying at a dead loss. Their discriminations against intermediate points, carried on now for a long period, have broken down the business of those points and deprived the railroads gradually of a traffic which at first was large but is steadily declining. They are killing the goose that laid the golden eggs for them, and they are fast tending to the point of having little else than through business to do. The time was when the grain and flour business of Pittsburgh was a large and growing one; now it is practically destroyed. And so of other business. The whole tendency of discrimination is to concentrate business at the extremities and to render it impossible to carry on business anywhere else. The result is that the roads get much more business to do at losing rates than they are able to pick up at profitable rates; and, if the present state of things continues, the period at which all these roads will be ruined is simply a matter of calculation.

The principle of fair play is the only one under which business can be successfully carried on; and so far as Congress can enforce that principle, so far is it bound to see that it is enforced. Property near the seaboard is more valuable than property in Nebraska because it is nearer to market; but if nearness to a market is not accompanied with corresponding cheapness of transportation all the advantages of nearness are lost. The farmer in Lebanon County, Pennsylvania, is within eighty miles of Philadelphia, and he has raised a splendid crop of wheat upon a farm that cost him from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars an acre. If it costs him as much to ship his wheat to Philadelphia as it does the farmer in Wisconsin, who paid but $10 an acre for his farm, what compensation has the Lebanon County man for the difference in capital? The whole system is too unfair to be argued upon. The wrong is a self-evident one; and there would be just as much reason in arguing that larceny and arson are wrong as to waste time in proving that to be wrong which every man must see and feel is so.

The people of this country who live at points touched by competing lines do not feel this system of oppression; but they must remember that there are many other places which have not that good fortune and cannot have, in the nature of things. These are the places which cry out for the help which this law proposes. They cannot help themselves by any act of their own, and unless Congress helps them, by insuring them common justice, they must be content to see their business ruined, their capital destroyed, and their hopes of future prosperity blasted. All they ask is fair play. They are willing to pay as much for transportation as other people pay, in proportion to their distance from market, but they are not willing to pay more, and it is the duty of Congress to see that they are not required to pay more. What would the people of Chicago say if they had to ship their freight to Milwaukee or Saint Louis in order to get cheaper rates to the seaboard? Yet that is what has happened in Pittsburgh in more cases than one. I am told of a manufacturing firm there which, having an order from Boston, was compelled to send the wares ordered first to Cincinnati, four hundred and fifty miles west by water, and thence three hundred miles by rail back through Pittsburgh, and was able thus, by sending them a useless journey of seven hundred and fifty miles, to ship them cheaper to Boston than it could do by shipping them direct from Pittsburgh to Boston. It would be possible to give thousands of similar instances, but it is not necessary. I may merely mention, in passing, as illustrating another phase of this question, that it has been found cheaper to ship goods, say marble for instance, from Philadelphia to Washington, Pennsylvania, a distance of three hundred and eighty-one miles, than from Pittsburgh to Washington, Pennsylvania, a distance of only twenty-eight miles. The reason is that Washington, Pennsylvania, can be reached by two routes from Philadelphia and by only one from Pittsburgh. Such anomalies as these cannot be suffered to exist without exacting a loud remonstrance; and fairness demands that the remonstrance should be heard and heeded.

In passing this law Congress is doing no injury or wrong to the railroads. On the contrary, it is keeping the railroads from doing injury to themselves. Experience has proved to every railroad man that no form of mutual agreement can be devised that will compel the railroad companies to keep faith with each other. Their compacts are broken almost as soon as made, and nothing but the firm hand of the law will keep them from cutting each other's throats. When they find that they cannot make up their losses on through freight by levying double tolls upon local freight, they will be compelled to carry at remunerative rates or go into bankruptcy. Discrimination in local freights is now the one sole resource that enables them to cut on through rates. Take that away from them and they will have to confront the naked question, How far can we cut rates in safety to ourselves? And having found the boundary which they cannot safely pass, they will learn to regard it as a "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," and abide on the hither side of the line.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MILLS. I was astonished a few moments ago to see so good a lawyer as my friend from New York openly and defiantly challenge the production of authorities to support the power of Congress to regulate charges made by common carriers, and I should not have taken the floor but to give him the authorities he has called for.

Now, sir, in the case of Munn vs. Illinois, 94 U. S. Reports, S. C., 113, that very question came before the Supreme Court of the United States, the precise question whether the Government had a right in the regulation of commerce to prescribe the maximum of charges. Of course in five minutes I cannot fully go into the details of the question, but in this case of Munn vs. The State of Illinois the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the Government cannot interfere as to regulations of the price of property where it is purely of an individual nature between man and man, but that where the property is used for a public purpose, where the public have an interest in it as that of common carriers, there it is a part of the right of regulation. As I have said, I have not time to read the whole decision, but I give what refers to the legal question. It is a decision made by Chief-Justice Waite:

> Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control.
> In countries where the common law prevails it has been customary from time immemorial for the legislature to declare what shall be a reasonable compensation under such circumstances, or perhaps more properly speaking, to fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable. Undoubtedly in mere private contracts, relating to matters in which the public has no interest, what is reasonable must be determined judicially, but this is because the legislature has no control over such a contract. So, too, in matters which do affect the public interest, and as to which legislative control may be exercised, if there are no statutory regulations upon the subject the courts must determine what is reasonable. The controlling fact is the power to regulate at all. If that exists, the right to establish the maximum of charge, as one of the means of regulations, is implied.

I will state to the House that in 1874 when a bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce by Mr. McCrary, this very question was discussed, and I in common with all this side of the House, and of course, with my friend from New York, voted against that bill. And I would have voted against it to-day, but I hold my own private view about the question as well as that of the gentleman from New York as to the legal interpretation is controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. But when the Supreme Court of the United States created to decide this question lays down the law, there is an end to litigation on this subject.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker, we are evidently entering on an untried field of legislation, and certainly the dictates of common caution should induce us to proceed with care, especially as this bill is so encumbered with a mass of words as to render its true construction extremely difficult. The power of the Federal Government undoubtedly extends to the right—

> To regulate commerce among the several States.

And the Constitution provides further that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Now this bill, if I understand it, and I have given it some care, provides that a corporation—one extending, we shall say, from the city of Saint Louis to the city of New York—shall not charge more for carrying a car-load of freight from Saint Louis to a point we shall call Smithtown, one hundred miles west of New York, than for carrying it clear through to New York. Now, let us see if this is clear from criticism. At this little place of Smithtown the company is obliged to keep up a full corps of agents, all the officers necessary in a large city. The car must be stopped there. When unloaded that car must be carried somewhere else, because they cannot get a return load of freight. At this point they may not have a car-load of freight more than once or twice a year. Then, to say the company shall get no more for carrying that car-load to Smithtown than for carrying it through to New York, where they would have an immediate opportunity to reload and return, is, in my judgment, an attempt to exercise unjustly the power of Congress, if it has any power in this direction, as against the company.

Again, what does this right to regulate commerce mean? I believe, sir, that the current of the decisions of the Supreme Court will not oppose the view I take when I submit that this right merely means that the people of Pennsylvania, to use an illustration already introduced into this debate, with reference to their oil shall not charge a citizen of the State of New York, or that a corporation created by the State of Pennsylvania shall not charge a citizen of New York or of Ohio, any more for carrying that character of freight from Pittsburgh to New York than it charges a citizen of Pennsylvania. It means that the State of Illinois, on the other hand, or Indiana or Ohio shall not either directly or indirectly by creation of agencies or corporations provide that a discrimination shall be made for the carriage of freight through those States from Saint Louis to New York against the city of New York or South Carolina or any other State; that, in a word, the privilege of a citizen of the United States attaches in virtue of his citizenship, and that no unjust discriminations shall be made in favor of one citizen and against another. To use the current phraseology of our treaties, "The citizen of one State shall be entitled to all the privileges in this regard enjoyed by the citizen of the most favored State." When we have done that, Congress, in my judgment, has done all it should attempt to do in this direction. I do not believe it is wise for us to say or attempt to say to the corporations created in the several States that we shall adjust or fix the rates or compel them to desist from discriminations in the one direction or the other; and if there is one car-load of freight to be carried by one company there should be extended to it the privileges which apply to a company having a thousand car-loads to carry.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CALKINS. I renew it.

I do not propose to undertake to argue any constitutional question in a five-minute debate, but to call the attention of the committee to some of the provisions of the bill, and then to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to make an explanation as to whether my deductions are right or wrong. I want to say by way of premising my remarks that amid the sarcasm, wit, and logic of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] he brought out one serious objection to the bill, as I understood him. To this I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas. The first section provides that it shall be unlawful for any corporation to charge a greater or less sum than any other corporation will charge for the like freight

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CALKINS. Wait a moment. Let me read this section stripped of its verbiage. This section provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company * * * running or using any railroad or railway * * * directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any corporation, company, person, or party any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward for the receiving, delivering, * * * than shall be received and retained from any other corporation, company, person, or party for the same or substantially the same or similar acts, * * * or while the same schedule relating thereto hereinafter provided for shall be in force.

Now, if it does not provide that substantially, then I am wrong in my construction of language; that is, that it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to charge a greater or less freight than is charged by another railroad company which has a fixed tariff as provided in section 6.

Mr. BEEBE. Oh, no!

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana state his proposition again?

Mr. CALKINS. I have not time to state it again. I want to call attention to section 6, which provides the schedule. Section 6 provides—

First, the different kinds and classes of all property to be carried;

Second, the different places and termini between and at which each kind and class of such property will be carried, received, and delivered; and,

Third, the rates of freight and prices for the carriage from place to place, and between the different places aforesaid, and for the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, and storing of each kind and class of said property, and the rates of freight and prices aforesaid, separately, when separate rate or charge, rates or charges, are to be made for any of the matters aforesaid.

Now, there is a schedule fixed by the bill, if I am not mistaken, and I want to ask whether the point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is not good: that instead of preventing a combination the bill directly makes a combination between railroad companies.

Mr. REAGAN. I will respond to the gentleman in my own time.

Mr. CALKINS. It amounts to this: that, if one trunk line shall prescribe a certain rate of freight which is lower than another, it could force all the others to take the lower rate of freight or break up their business and thus destroy competition. Is not that the legitimate construction of the two sections?

Mr. REAGAN. In the first place we make no comparison of different rates; but we require by the bill that the rates of freights and facilities afforded upon lines of transportation shall be equal to all.

Mr. CALKINS. How is that fixed by the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman refers to the clause of the bill relating to the schedule and suggests whether under this section we do not regulate the rates of freight. The only thing prescribed in relation to freight rates is that the rates of State freights shall be posted up. That is an enforcement by the bill for the equalization of interstate trade in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that no man shall be charged more for interstate commerce than is charged for State commerce. The first section of the bill defines what interstate commerce is. It is commerce passing through a State or a Territory or from the United States to a foreign country or from a foreign country into the United States.

It does not matter whether the freight passes over one line or over several lines before it reaches its destination; and in order to regulate the subject and to give efficiency to the regulation the bill requires the posting up of the rates on State commerce in order to protect the interstate commerce from being charged more than the State commerce is charged. I want to say, with all the emphasis that I have the power to say it with, that this bill does not provide in any particular for the fixing of any rate, great or small, on commerce, either in or out of the States. It does not make the rates upon one road depend in any particular upon the rates of another road. It does not make the rates on a line of transportation, whether over one or many roads, depend upon the existence of another line of transportation. It does not, as was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] defeat competition, for it fixes no rate, but leaves the field just as open to competition after the bill is passed as it is to-day.

Gentlemen are fighting a wind-mill.

Gentlemen may think that the bill is too technical, but in dealing with railroad corporations we should have the law so framed as to prevent it, by any technical arrangement, from defeating the will of the people. And this bill was framed by a skilled lawyer, not by my skill, who had studied the subject and so drew it as to exclude every technical trick or advantage and to insure that justice to the people that should be enforced by the law.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. Does not this bill require railroads which are entirely within the bounds of one State to carry freight at the same rate which is charged by roads running through various States?

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad that the gentleman has asked me that question, because he has discussed the question under a misapprehension that may have misled others. The bill does not do so. It does this: you will see that in the first section of the bill, that defines interstate commerce, it prescribes no rates for freight, but says that as to interstate commerce a greater amount shall not be charged for shorter than for longer distances; but if the commerce begins and ends in one State the bill does not touch it, and we have not the power to touch it.

Mr. LAPHAM. Then why the necessity of the fourth section?

Mr. REAGAN. I have stated its objects. The first part declares that as to interstate commerce a man shall not be charged more for a shorter than for a longer distance, and then it provides that more shall not be charged for interstate commerce than for State commerce.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask the gentleman if he has any objection to state what good lawyer drew the bill. He said he did not draw it himself, but that a skillful lawyer drew it.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman had better speak to the bill, and not to the lawyer who drew it.

Mr. BLAIR. I have great difficulty in understanding the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I gave a reasonable share of attention to this bill and think I have something like an approximate idea of what the bill proposes. I have never heard a bill discussed here in this House by gentlemen so thoroughly ignorant of the provisions of a bill as they are in this case.

Mr. CLYMER. How could it be otherwise?

Mr. DUNNELL. There are gentlemen here who ought to be earnestly in favor of the passage of the bill, but who have made speeches against it, whose voices would not have been raised against it if they had understood its simple provisions.

As I understand the bill, it simply aims at two things. It seeks to prevent the unjust discrimination which now characterizes the interstate commerce carried on by railroads. It prevents drawbacks or rebates. It says that I shall be allowed to ship a car-load of wheat from Chicago to New York at precisely the same rates of freight, no more and no less, as my neighbor may ship it from the same point. This is the great leading principle of the bill: that there shall be no drawback; that the powerful corporation shall have no rights which the private citizen along the line of the road may not have; that no corporation or person shall get better rates than an individual; that this interstate commerce shall be absolutely just, absolutely equal to all who participate in it. Now, I do not believe that any man on this floor can find fault with this provision of the bill.

There is another provision, the only other provision, the very crowning virtue of this bill, in my judgment, and these two objects are the only two objects which the bill seeks to attain. The other object is, that there shall not be charged a higher rate for a shorter than for a longer distance. As an illustration, a car loaded with wheat shall not leave Milwaukee, under the rules and regulations of interstate commerce, and be landed at Philadelphia at a less charge than that same car-load of wheat can be carried from Milwaukee to Pittsburgh. It is but right and just that Pittsburgh, being nearer to the wheat-fields of the West, shall get her wheat at least as cheaply as does Philadelphia. Under the regulations now adopted by railroads, the people of Philadelphia get their flour cheaper from the manufacturer in the West than do the people of Pittsburgh. The eaters of flour in Pittsburgh must pay more for their flour than the people of Philadelphia. This is the great evil which this bill seeks to remedy.

Gentlemen see terrible bugbears in this bill. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] who spoke here to-day, says that he wants more than a day in which to turn a somersault on this question. A day is enough for a man to turn a somersault on the question whether Congress can regulate this interstate commerce. And I was surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] with all his learning, his keenness, and his recognized ability, did not attack the impregnable argument that was made by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I say that the argument of the gentleman from Texas is unanswerable. Not one of the Supreme Court decisions contained in the argument did these gentlemen even refer to, for they were unable to meet them.

The reasonings and decisions of the Supreme Court upon the power and right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce are found in the following cases: Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1; License cases, 5 Howard, 504 and 509; case of the State freight tax, 15 Wallace, 232, 275.; Passenger cases, 7 Howard, 285, 462; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 557.

We are now arrived at the inquiry, what is this power? It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

In the case of the City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Peters, 102, 157, Mr. Justice Story says:

The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States has been deemed exclusive from the nature and objects of the power, and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise. Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum, and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part.

The following cases are also cited: Sinnot vs. Davenport, 22 Howard, 227, 243; Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wallace, 713; Crandall vs. State of Nevada, 6 Wallace, 35.

In Corfula vs. Coryell, 4 Wash. Cir. C. R., 344, 378, Mr. Justice Washington said:

Commerce with foreign nations and among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse among those States for purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by the passage overland through the States when such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in 1824, said:

Commerce in its simplest signification means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various medi-ums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation.

Mr. Justice Field, in Welton vs. State of Missouri, 1 Otto, 275, 280, said:

The power to regulate it [commerce] mbraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted.

Other numerous decisions could be given.

It has been said in the debate that under this bill competition among railroads will come to an end or be rendered impossible. There is not a single provision of the bill which can at all conduce to such a result. Each and every railroad is left wholly free to charge what they please and combine in their business or not. In this regard they must charge to all the same and they must do equal justice to all. I would if I had time answer other objections which have been raised during the discussion, but time is not allowed me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the case which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] cited as having led him to change his judgment in respect to the power of Congress to pass this bill is a case, as I read it, which has nothing at all to do with the question of constitutional power involved here.

The learned gentleman said that when bills of a character like this were being considered in a former Congress he thought that Congress had no power under the authority to regulate interstate commerce to make provisions such as those contained in this bill. But he thinks he finds in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States he cited, the case of Munn vs. Illinois, that that high court had held that such a power could be exercised, and therefore is ready to support this bill. It is true the court so held; but of a power exercised by whom? Exercised by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, under a provision of the constitution of the State of Illinois.

In that case it was argued that the State had no right to make the regulation which it had made, first, because of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States against the interference by any State with vested rights of property; and, second, that the law regulating warehouses in Illinois, under which the suit was brought, was in violation of that provision of the Constitution of the United States which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States.

Now, the decision of the court, so far from saying that Congress had power to make any regulation of the kind which was therein debated, held only that the regulation by the State was authorized, and did not interfere with the power of Congress referred to. That the House may see that this is so, I send up to be read by the Clerk a paragraph from the opinion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What case is that?

Mr. POTTER. The Chicago Warehouse case.

The Clerk read as follows:

We come now to consider the effect upon this statute of the power of Congress to regulate commerce. It was very properly said in the case of the State tax on railway gross receipts, 15 Wall., 293, that "it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution." The warehouses of these plaintiffs in error are situated and their business carried on exclusively within the limits of the State of Illinois. They are used as instruments by those engaged in State as well as those engaged in interstate commerce; but they are no more a part of commerce itself than the dray or the cart by which but for them grain would be transferred from one railroad station to another. Incidentally they may become connected with interstate commerce, but not necessarily so.

Mr. POTTER. Now Congress never having made any regulation of the kind proposed by the bill under consideration, no question of its constitutionality could ever before have arisen, and no court could therefore ever have passed upon that question.

Mr. REAGAN. Congress, I believe, has passed a law to regulate the carrying of cattle on cars.

A MEMBER. That bill never became a law.

Mr. POTTER. I think the gentleman from Texas is right. I believe such a statute was passed by a former, a republican Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not read the law, but I have seen the practice under it, and therefore suppose it did pass.

Mr. POTTER. Gentlemen around me say that it did not become a law. But I remember very well that it passed this House, and I remember it was urged as a measure of humanity. But at the time I predicted that it would before long lead to some assumption of power over trade by Congress of far greater consequence, and I think the democrats of the House generally opposed it.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. The bill did become a law.

Mr. POTTER. Of course the difference between saying that cattle shall be watered every twelve hours and saying what a railroad company shall or shall not charge is material enough; but the legislation is all in the same line. It illustrates what I said when I was up before: once begin with this business of "regulating" and Congress will have to go on "regulating" everything connected with interstate trade.

Now, I agree that there are evils in the direction at which this bill points; that our railroad corporations make unjust discriminations among their customers. It may indeed be that the States cannot sufficiently control them. But that has not been tried, and however that may prove, it does seem to me that if there is anything in the world that is dangerous or anything that is undemocratic, it is for Congress to begin to set on foot "regulations" of the character proposed by this bill.

Mr. DICKEY obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. POTTER.

Mr. POTTER. We shall thus, if we begin, be drawn on step by step until by and by the whole time of the Congress will be needed for "regulating" the trade of the country. When that time comes these great corporations will, I fear, find means to "regulate" Congress. When property to the extent of $100,000,000 gets concentrated in the hands of one concern the less we attempt to palliate the evils resulting from its management by measures like that under consideration, and the sooner we set about restricting by amendment to the Federal Constitution, if necessary, the creation of such great concerns the better. Abuses of the kind referred to in this bill will be corrected in some way—by the action of the people, by the action of the State Legislatures, or by the action of the courts. But every injustice is not to be made the subject of legislation in Congress. Indeed if it had power Congress is ill fitted by its nature from dealing wisely with such evils.

The States are far more competent to regulate and to regulate wisely such matters, and they will regulate them in some way or other. They can repeal the charters of these companies or make other laws in respect to them as common carriers. Let Congress, then, leave these regulations to the States. If, then, it would forbid the consolidation of corporations created by different States we should have no more artificial creatures too great to be controlled by the States which made them——

Mr. MITCHELL. That, I will remind the gentleman from New York, is not always within the power of the State Legislatures. For instance, in my own State, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was chartered long before there was inserted in the Constitution any provision reserving to the Legislature the power to amend or repeal charters of corporations; and now the railroad company takes the position that the provision of the new constitution adopted in 1873 prohibiting railroad companies from charging more for a shorter distance than for a longer distance on the same line does not apply to them.

Mr. POTTER. Yes, sir; but I understand there is a further provision in that constitution that whenever any further legislation is accepted by the company they shall accept the provisions of the constitution.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true.

Mr. POTTER. Though the contingency has not yet arrived on which that provision is to become operative it must come. But in Heaven's name, if you cannot reach the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in the State of Pennsylvania, how are you going to reach it in this Congress? Is this House to "regulate" everything?

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit that the question is one of power, not of policy.

Mr. POTTER. I submit that it is both. One must consider the effect of the power in seeking to determine where the power rests; and a construction of the Constitution which enables Congress, under the power to "regulate commerce," to deal with railroad freights will be a construction so dangerous that it will deliver this Government over to worse things, I fear, than any we have ever seen. That is the reason I am opposed to such a construction.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a single question?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly; I always yield to everybody who asks me to yield.

Mr. CHALMERS. Does not the gentleman see that a case may arise in which it will be found that a State, under the form of regulating its own affairs, is encroaching upon the exclusive domain of Congress in respect to interstate commerce?

Mr. POTTER. Of course there may be such cases. The States have made many regulations of foreign trade which have been held to interfere with the exclusive domain of Congress in respect to commerce. But because a State has not power, it does not therefore necessarily follow that Congress has that power——

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman admits that Congress has exclusive control over interstate commerce.

Mr. POTTER. Certainly; but the vital question is whether that exclusive jurisdiction extends to the right to regulate the price which the interstate carrier shall put on his services.

Mr. REAGAN. That we do not pretend to do. There is no use of arguing against it; it is not in the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. The bill does not undertake to prescribe what shall be charged, but merely that there shall not be improper discrimination in charges.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman only turns the provision of this bill bottom side up. He does not alter the question at issue at all. If Congress has power to say that the railroads shall not charge more for one service than for another, it has power to regulate the charge to be made by the railroads for their service. That is the whole question of power involved.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in company with a great many gentlemen who have spoken on this bill I regret that it is drawn so much in the form of a common-law indictment. I have no doubt that the verbiage used in it has misled a great many men as to its purposes. I have read it through with as much care as I could give it, and I will try to state what I understand to be its provisions.

The first and second sections define what is meant by an interstate railway. It is a road owned by one company, running through more than one State, or a combination of roads owned by several companies, so as to make a continuous line through more than one State.

Taking that as a definition of interstate railway, the bill makes the following provision: first, that an interstate railroad company as defined above shall afford equal facility both as to handling and transporting freights to all its customers, whether they be persons or corporations, and that it shall have equal charges for freights and service to all its customers, whether they be persons or corporations, for the same sort of service. That I take it is the first general doctrine of the bill. That is backed up and defended by these, in the second and third sections, that the companies described above shall not be permitted to evade the provisions of the first section by pretending or contracting with some parties as though they were a continuous line and treating others as though they were not; that being defined to be an interstate road they shall be so to everybody. And in the second place they shall not evade this provision by taking any rebate or giving any rebate as they do in many cases. That makes four of the sections of the bill. Those four sections are crystallized around the one thought that an interstate railway as above defined shall give equal facilities to all its customers, and shall charge the same rate to all for the same service. In that I concur.

The second point in the bill is this: that an interstate railway company or combination of companies shall never charge a greater rate for a short distance than they charge for the same service for a longer distance.

A MEMBER. Per mile.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, not per mile, but distance. If they will carry at a certain figure five hundred miles, then they shall never charge more for carrying four hundred and fifty or three hundred miles or any shorter distance. That is the second principle of the bill. I regret those two central doctrines of the bill have been wreathed about by so much of the verbiage of a common-law indictment, but I believe the bill fairly illustrates and expresses, though entangled with words, those doctrines. To those doctrines I give my assent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I take the floor, and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thank my colleage for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me state further that the seventh and eighth sections provide penalties for the violation of these provisions, and the ninth and last section provides, as I understand it, that this bill shall not apply to less than a car-load, as that would be going down into the minutiæ, which we could not undertake to do. It then provides that the United States shall have special privileges and rights over all other customers. I think I have stated in brief the substance of this bill.

In the Thirty-eighth Congress a case arose upon which I had occasion to present a report and make a speech to this House. The State of New Jersey gave exclusive rights for twenty years to the Camden and Amboy Railroad to do all the railroad transportation from Philadelphia to New York and they absolutely prohibited any other company from carrying a ton of through freight anywhere. They charged a higher rate for through freight and through passengers than they did for local freight and local passengers. By giving a sort of bounty to the State of New Jersey they levied a tax upon all her sister States, and for years before the war that State received enough bounty from that source to pay off the State debt and leave a surplus; so that the State of New Jersey absolutely maintained its government by a tax upon the travel of the world of outsiders. And when during the war a combination of smaller routes enabled the people of that State to carry by what was known as the "elbow route," from Camden to the Raritan Bay, and when under the pressure of the war Secretary Stanton gave them power to carry troops and munitions of war, the officers of the Camden and Amboy Railroad absolutely came to this capital and asked the Secretary to pay them all the pay that the other and rival road had got upon the ground that the other and rival road had no business under the law of New Jersey to carry through freight whatever. The Secretary of course refused their demand; but they came to this House, and I was a new member on the Committee on Military Affairs at the time, and presented to that committee their bill, asking us to pass a law directing the Secretary of War to pay them all the other company had earned because they had done it in violation of the monopoly rights of the Camden and Amboy Railroad. On that hint I spoke. We passed a law of five lines—and I esteem it to have been an honor to have had a part in that work—that when any railroad was built anywhere which made a continuous line it should be lawful for it to carry freight and passengers and charge therefor. That was the first break ever made in this miserable, narrow State policy. But no sooner had we passed it than the Camden and Amboy Railroad bought up the rival road and consolidated it into its own power.

Now at last, under the decision of the Supreme Court and the larger thoughts of unity in America, we are achieving a bill here to-day based on the Constitution and, in my judgment, based on the great rights of commerce; and while I regret that it is wreathed about with so many words and phrases I shall vote for it, trusting to the committee's statement that they have made it conform to the two ideas I have indicated.

Mr. LATHROP. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. If this bill should become a law, would it be lawful for a merchant at Chicago to charter a vessel to carry a load of grain to Buffalo?

Mr. REAGAN. This bill has nothing to do with the chartering of vessels. It does not affect that one way or the other.

Mr. ITTNER. I am in favor of this bill because I believe it is a move in the right direction. As far as concerns the constitutional power of Congress to pass and enforce such a bill I shall leave to others to decide; but if Congress has not that power under the present Constitution, the sooner the Constitution is so changed as to give that power the better it will be for the people of this country. I say, sir, if we cannot make this proposed legislation fit to the Constitution, then let us make the Constitution fit to it. That is all I desire to say on the constitutional question involved in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill because, sir, I believe it will accomplish an object that I as a member of the legislative body of my State have during several sessions endeavored to accomplish, and that, sir, was in relation to the great discriminations and outrages that were perpetrated upon the stockholders of railroads and the shippers thereon in my State for years, brought about under the exactions of these fast freight transportation companies. I believe, sir, that the provisions of this bill, should it pass and become a law, when they are enforced, will reach to those evils and exterminate these parasites and blood-suckers, since they can be called by no other name. I desire to say as between the humblest citizen of the United States and the most powerful monopoly within its domain I would in splitting a hair split it in the center. I am no communist; but I desire to say in reference to the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] wherein they expressed the fear that a time is approaching, and that the passage of this bill will hurry that time, when the railroad monopolies of this country will control Congress and its legislation——

Mr. FRANKLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ITTNER. In the five minutes allotted to me I cannot afford to be interrupted in the course of my remarks. I desire that that issue shall be raised. And do we know that even now the monopolies of this country are not in a great measure controlling the election of members to this body?

I say, sir, I desire that that issue shall be made. Here is the language of the gentleman from New York—you pass this bill and soon no man living on the line of one of these great corporations can expect to be elected to Congress unless he is committed to act as these roads may require. I say God forbid that such a sad fate should ever befall this country. If with all our boasted freedom and ability for self-government there still remains in store for us so sad a fate as that depicted by the gentlemen from Wisconsin and New York, the sooner we know it the better. For myself, I entertain no such fears. No, I cannot and will not believe that the American people who fought so long and suffered so much to free themselves from the yoke of British tyranny are at this late day prepared to become the voluntary slaves of moneyed monopolies. No, I will not believe it.

Mr. CHALMERS. When I called the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to the clause of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it was announced that the Congress had the exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce, the question was asked by two gentleman from that State [Mr. POTTER and Mr. BEEBE] what was meant by interstate commerce, as if that did not include the right to regulate charges on railroads. I refer the gentlemen to the very same decision in which the court says:

> The controlling fact is the power to regulate at all. If that exists, the right to establish the maximum of charge, as one of the means of regulation, is implied. (Munn vs. Illinois, 4 Otto, 134.)

There, sir, you have an answer as to what is meant by regulating interstate commerce. But that is not all that the Supreme Court has said. In the case of the Chicago, &c., Railroad Company vs. Iowa, the court uttered this emphatic language, which I shall quote. This, I will state, was a case arising upon a State statute involving the right to regulate the charges of railroads, the very question which now comes up here, except in that case it was as to the power of a State to regulate the charges of a railroad in its own limits, and here it is as to the power of Congress to regulate the charges of a railroad running through more than one State. The court says:

> The objection that the statute complained of is void because it amounts to a regulation of commerce among the States, has been sufficiently considered in the case of Munn vs. Illinois. This road, like the warehouse in that case, is situated within the limits of a single State. Its business is carried on there, and its regulation is a matter of domestic concern. It is employed in State as well as in interstate commerce, and until Congress acts the State must be permitted to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the promotion of the general welfare of the people within its own jurisdiction, even though in so doing those without may be indirectly affected.—Chicago et al. Railroads vs. Iowa, 4 Otto, 163.

"Until Congress acts." Acts how? Acts upon what? Upon the regulation of the rates of charges made by these great corporations which are created by legislation. They are artificial channels of commerce created by man under authority of law. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] well said to-day that when the Constitution was framed we had no idea about railroads. That is true. Nor had we then any idea of telegraph lines. Yet the Supreme Court has recently decided in a Florida case, not yet reported, that Congress has power over the telegraph lines by the same clause of the Constitution which gives it power to regulate commerce. The court speaking of railroads again says:

Their regulation is a thing of domestic concern, and certainly, until Congress acts in reference to their interstate relations, the State may exercise all the powers of government over them, even though in so doing it may indirectly operate upon commerce outside its immediate jurisdiction. We do not say that a case may not arise in which it will be found that a State, under the form of regulating its own affairs, has encroached upon the exclusive domain of Congress in respect to interstate commerce; but we do say that, upon the facts as they are represented to us in this record, that has not been done.—Munn vs, Illinois, 4 Otto, 135.

These railroads, as I have said, are great artificial channels of commerce, and it is the duty of Congress and the States to regulate them. Why? Because exclusive privileges are conferred upon them. They have the right of eminent domain given to them. They have to some extent the powers of sovereignty vested in them.

They have certainly a monopoly of their tracks, and in this are unlike our great rivers upon which any man may set afloat any boat he chooses, and it is essential to the rights of the people that the States shall regulate commerce upon railroads in the States and Congress shall regulate rates of railroads wherever interstate commerce is concerned. Whenever a road runs through more than one State, then Congress should exercise the power which the State exercises within its own borders. But this bill does not interfere with the rights of the States at all, because the bill simply prevents a road from charging more for short than for long distances. Thus by its very terms regulating the long and not the short rates, it can never interfere with any regulations made by the States, nor does it seek to regulate the charges on roads which lie within the limits of any one State.

We had occasion in the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to investigate the action of a great railroad corporation, the Union Pacific, chartered by the Government itself, and we found that it had failed to obey the law of its own creation, that it was swallowing up another smaller corporation, the Kansas Pacific, in the same manner as the road described by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in his reference to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the five-minute rule be read and enforced.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

60. No member shall occupy more than one hour in a debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee. Provided, further, That the House may, by a vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five-minute debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only.

Mr. ITTNER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I renew the amendment. The object of this bill, as I understand it, is to assert the power of the Government of the United States to regulate the railroad traffic among the States. I believe fully in the existence of that power. I believe that it is as necessary that it should be exercised by the Government as it is that any other act should be done by Congress, and I have no doubt whatever that it will be exercised. There may be defects in the provisions or expressions of this bill, but so far as the constitutional power is concerned its existence cannot be denied. We have the power under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States and that is applicable to the railroads between the States as it is to other means of transportation.

I think that it is an error to consider this question as limited by growing out of the law relating to common carriers. The railroads are not merely common carriers; they are something more than common carriers. A common carrier cannot take property; he cannot build a road through a town, city, or State; he cannot tear down a church; he cannot change the rights of individuals in any property whatever, but, under a charter from a State or from the General Government, a railway company can go anywhere within the limits of its charter and take possession of any kind of property in its way. It is because it has a charter from the General Government or from a State that it can do this. The law of common carriers confers no such privileges and gives no such rights. It is a franchise conferred by the Government and there are corresponding obligations that attend it. Such companies, therefore, are infinitely superior in their character as in their capacities to common carriers, and they are not to be limited by the power of the Government over common carriers, if the Government has any power over them.

I do not now make any question in regard to the creation or control of these corporations as whether it be of the General Government or the governments of a State. I consider the question only as affecting the right and power of the government, State or national, whichever it may be, to control these corporations for purposes of transportation. It is indispensable that this power should be recognized and exercised, otherwise they have entire control of the domestic and foreign commerce of the country. They can do what the Government of the United States cannot do. They can control the commerce of the country in favor of the port of New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore as against Boston or any other city. Congress cannot do that; the Constitution forbids it. And to say that Congress must allow these corporations to exercise such power as that, is a proposition absolutely indefensible, and which, if established, would be resisted. It is for this reason that some legal and constitutional authority should interpose for the protection of the interests of the people and the rights of the several governments, State and national.

In my own section of the country I have been told that in the town of Brighton, where there is a celebrated cattle market, which has existed for nearly a hundred years, five men control it. I was told by a butcher in my neighborhood, that he could not buy an animal in the market, and if a man enters into a contract with another individual against the privileges conferred by these corporations, upon those associated with them, he would have thereafter no chance to trade in that market. It is such combinations that have increased so largely the cost of the necessaries of life, and it can only be done by some act like that before us. I give it my support for these reasons.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say in reference to the power we have over this subject that I disagree entirely with the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and in this disagreement I think I am wholly justified by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dartmouth College case and the cases following it. The Supreme Court has held from the beginning that a charter to a corporation is a contract within the Constitution of the United States which prohibits all the States of the Union from impairing the obligations of contracts. Under those decisions it has been held repeatedly—so many times that it cannot now be questioned—that no Legislature of any State has a right to change a contract made between a State and a corporation by a charter.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I do not dispute that. But in many States the constitution reserves to the Legislature the power to repeal or alter any charter, and therefore the power is reserved.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true as to New York, but it was not so in the beginning; it is also true as to Pennsylvania, but not prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1873. The Pennsylvania Railroad was chartered in 1846, but it now claims to hold its charter superior to the constitution made in 1873, and in that particular I fear they are correct and that the courts will determine that that corporation is superior to all the power the people have on the subject.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman answer me this question: does he claim that because a State has inhibited itself from exercising power over its creature, that confers any power upon Congress?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; I did not say so; but the gentleman asserted that this was a matter that should be regulated by the States, if I understand him correctly. In reply to that I say that the question of power is in the way, that the people have no power, except they have reserved it in the original charters granted to railroads; and that was not done in the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad and other railroads. For that reason, if for no other, I say that the time has come in the history of this Government when the people through their representatives here must exercise the right which they have under the Constitution to regulate commerce, if they would preserve their liberties and privileges as a free people.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Does the gentleman say that Congress has the power to legislate and take away from these corporations a power which the States have given them, and which by the laws and constitutions of the States those States themselves cannot take away?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do, in any case coming within the provisions of the Constitution of the United States granting power to Congress. And the gentleman must not presume that I am so ignorant as to claim that Congress has a power unless it is given that power by direct grant. Here we have an express grant of power to regulate commerce among the States. If we have not, then I agree wholly in sentiment with the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ITTNER,] that it is high time that the people of the United States as a whole shall demand that the Constitution of the United States shall be so amended in that particular as that there shall be no corporation greater than the Government, either State or national.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I renew it. There can be no one upon this floor more anxious than I am to assist in passing a bill which will regulate freights upon railroads in the interest of cheap transportation for the producer and for the consumer, a uniform, cheap transportation. And I have no scruples about the power of Congress under its authority to regulate commerce among the States, to control those great systems of communication without which commerce would not fully and perfectly exist.

I desire to state these two propositions because I wish to say further that I have examined the bill now under consideration with an earnest desire to find that it did accomplish the purpose of protecting the people of my State and of the other Western States in their right to send their products to market as cheaply and as reasonably as they could. I hoped to find such a provision in this bill. If I believed that this bill embodied to any slight tangible degree the sentiment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD;] if I believed that his exposition of this bill did not arise out of his inner consciousness, and his attempt on a former occasion to do something that he thought was right and fair, and not from any construction which he has given or can give to this bill, I would vote for it most cheerfully.

Does the gentleman pretend to say that it is within his power to strip from this bill so much verbiage that he can find in it even the germ of his thought? Other gentlemen upon this floor, my colleagues and myself, alone and together, have sat down with pencil in hand and marked a pathway through this bill. As we say in the West in regard to our fine forests, we have gone from point to point and "blazed" the trees. We have "blazed" the words in this bill which should connect themselves together in some sentence that would enable us to find out what this bill meant. And we have become entangled and lost in its mazes beyond recovery, until we rushed away from the bill, taken thought again and regained our consciousness, and then come in here to hear some one else talk and become again confused. [Laughter.]

I did believe that this bill did not intend to lay its hand upon those rivals of railroad monopolies, steamboats, vessels, and canal-boats. I had intended at the proper time to move to strike out the words "or other means of transportation by common carriers," wherever they occurred in this bill, lest by any chance the bill should reach over and lay its hand upon the rival transportation by steamboats and vessels upon our lakes and rivers, the only preventive in the land to these vast railroad monopolies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAGE. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. REAGAN. As the previous question is to be called at four o'clock, I hope that we shall now be allowed to have a vote.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me now; he has occupied only an hour and a half on this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I thought the time of the gentleman had expired.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Am I not entitled to the floor?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has taken the floor and yielded his time to me. I will withdraw my amendment when I get through, so that the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] if he desires, can renew it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. When I was trying to find an escape for "other means of transportation by common carriers" those rivals of these great railroad corporations, these great trunk lines which if unchecked will swallow up all the smaller lines of our great Northwestern States, as well as buy up the canal boats, steamboats, and all other means of transportation where they can; while I was trying to do this, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] came in with an amendment to strike out the words "other means of transportation by common carriers" and boldly and broadly proposed to put in the words "ship, steamboat, or other vessels."

Now, does the gentleman mean that when wheat is taken from Oshkosh to Milwaukee, and thence by steam to Buffalo or Ogdensburgh, and thence by railroad to Boston and New York, that steamboat transportation shall be included in and covered by this bill, and that it shall be unlawful for any man to contract to pay more or to pay less freight upon any part of the whole line than he does upon any other given part of that line? Does he mean, by force of the law of the United States, to make steamboat freight and vessel freight and canal freight come up to the freight of the trunk lines or the smaller roads? If I can read rightly, if I can travel through this maze of words, it does mean that. "Oh, no," these learned gentlemen say. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] says it is "as clear as mud," and he wonders that other men cannot see it as clearly as he can. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] speaks, as he frequently does, from his former views and from his wishes. His wishes are mine, and I respond to them. But can the gentleman find anything like his beautiful theory in this bill? He says he has not read it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. CONGER. He said he had not read it much. Who can read it much? [Laughter.] If ever a man reads a bill at all he must read it more than the gentleman from Ohio read this.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nobody can read it without reading it much. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Now, sir, I wish that a bill to accomplish the objects suggested by the friends of this measure could be framed. I wish that this bill might go back to the committee, and that they might cut away from one end to the other words, words, words, until they have left thought and meaning expressed in sentences that an ordinary man like myself might possibly understand, with the help of all the interpretations that two or three hours' discussion could give. Let a bill be prepared that shall express the object. Let it be prepared so that it shall not compel steamboats and canals to be a part of these continuous lines and to have their freights regulated accordingly. Let the bill be so framed that, when the freight business is dull upon lines of railroad, men may ship their lumber and their wheat at a smaller rate than that continuous schedule. Under this bill no company can possibly change its rates until the schedule is changed, and that cannot be changed without ten days' notice.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there is anything in this bill which will prohibit a steamboat company from charging nothing or almost nothing, while the railroads are charging exorbitant prices.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I renew the amendment. I was surprised to hear the sentiment avowed by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] that it would be dangerous to legislate against any power possessing so much money as these corporations; that if we undertake to legislate at this day and in this Hall against such corporations our seats would very soon be filled, not by the Representatives of the people but by those whom the corporations would send here as their minions and tools. That is a dangerous sentiment to announce at a time like this when we are already brought in contact with these same corporations, with this same immense power, and when the issue is to be met and determined whether the people shall control the corporations or whether the corporations are to control this Congress.

By parity of reasoning the gentleman might have assumed that it was dangerous in New York City to attack Tweed after he had assumed the power of that whole city and concentrated millions of money in his hands and in the hands of his co-conspirators against the interests of that city. You did attack that power; you broke it down; and in so doing you extricated your city from a band of men who, you charged, had been robbing it for years. The question now is whether this Government is stronger than the corporations or whether the corporations are stronger than the Government; whether the commerce of this country is to be run in the interest of the people or in the interest of corporations. I hold that now is the time to determine that question. If this bill is not in the right form, let its defects be remedied; let us get a bill that will be right, that will regulate the commerce of this country in such a way that the whole price of our productions in the market will not be consumed by their transportation.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman allow me one moment? I quite agree with him as to the magnitude of corporate power and its dangers; and I am in favor of any lawful exercise of the power of Congress in respect of those dangers. All I meant to say was that the greater and the richer the country grows, the more dangerous it is to centralize in this body the exercise of power which can, I think, be more wisely, more safely, more effectually exercised by the States and the localities.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hold that it is safer to lodge the power here than in the corporations. Here is the place for the controlling power to be exercised. We are the Representatives of the people; and as such we represent the States. We had better exercise this power than allow the corporations of the country to do it. Every few days we see in the newspapers that there has been a combination between four great trunk lines of railroad in this country. What is the result of that combination? It is to draw from the people heavy exactions in the way of freights—in fact to consume the very productions of this country in their transportation to market. This bill will remedy that evil, at least it is a step in the right direction. It is intended to remedy that evil, and if defective, I ask gentlemen who object to it to suggest the cure for these defects by way of amendment.

It is bad policy for gentlemen to say this bill does not do anything. Why do they not cure the defects of this bill, if there are any, by proper amendment and not undertake to slaughter it by these personal attacks when they fail to do anything to remedy the evil which all admit. I say that it is a step in the right direction, and unless we do support this bill we will be in no better position than we are now. It is due to the people of this country whom we represent upon this floor that we should support this measure and make it the law. If it is not everything that ought to be done, if it should be defective in any point, we can provide hereafter for curing that defect and make it everything it should be to meet the demands of the people.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I stated to this House this bill had two main features and purposes: one was to prevent discrimination against persons and the other was to prevent undue discrimination against places. After a discussion of two hours

I think every gentleman on this floor who has paid any attention to it will concur in the assertion I have made. There are no other objects in it, there are no other remedies sought to be enforced than to prevent unjust discrimination against persons and to prevent discrimination unjustly against places.

So far as interstate commerce is concerned the purpose of the bill is to blot out the favoritism on the one side of State lines and county lines and districts on the other.

To those gentlemen who seem to be afraid it will interfere with the State-rights doctrine I wish simply to say this: that there is not in this bill from the beginning to the end of it one word which either limits or enlarges or controls in the most remote degree the right and power of the States over the State commerce and State trade. If States are unwise enough to desire to discriminate unfairly against their own citizens or the public by exorbitant rates, that is their own business and Congress has no power to interfere; but this bill does not assume jurisdiction; it simply provides that any interstate commerce passing through one State, or the company which transports that commerce, shall charge no more per mile per car for a certain character of freight than is authorized by the State law. So far, then, from interfering with State rights, it recognizes the control by the local government of every State of this Union.

Nor, sir, is the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] well founded that because a railroad company is limited in its charges therefore a steamboat or a steamship company must charge no more or no less. I want to say to my friend from Michigan that the first section of this bill has nothing to do with the rates of freight on commerce. It is confined exclusively to persons: that there shall be no unjust discrimination against persons; that a steamship company shall neither charge me more nor less than the gentleman from Michigan for a certain service at the same time. If a railroad shall charge $1,000 for a particular service and a steamship company will agree to perform the same service at the same time for nothing, it has the right to do it. There is nothing to prevent it. There are no comparative rates. The steamship company may charge its rates, and the railroad company may charge its rates, and one is absolutely free and independent of the other. One is not limited or affected by the other.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, exceedingly to be compelled to repeat what I stated the other day, that although the purposes of the bill are few, its objects simple, and while it is intended to carry out the desire of every gentleman on this floor, yet for certain causes, out of abundant caution no doubt, the real points have been covered up in a cloud of words which make it suspicious to some gentlemen who cannot comprehend, and who take suspicion from the fact it is guarded so minutely.

Mr. REAGAN. I move, Mr. Speaker, to close debate on this section and all amendments which may be offered to it, and I do so for the reason that unless we proceed to vote we will not get through with the bill to-night.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have a substantial amendment to this section, which I hope the gentleman will not cut off.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not desire to prevent amendments, but merely desire to close debate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will accept my amendment and let me have five minutes in which to explain it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves to close all debate on the section and amendments thereto. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas himself is the only one now pending.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to exclude amendments, but to close debate on the section and all the amendments thereto.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman, as I desired to introduce an important amendment, will allow me to have five minutes of it.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois suggests he has an amendment which he desires to discuss. I fear others may wish to follow him. I will agree, however, that he shall have his five minutes if it is understood that we shall then close debate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

At the end of line 65, section 1, add the following:

Any contract made by any person or corporation or person and corporation engaged in business as common carriers from one State or Territory into another State or Territory with any other person or corporation or person and corporation engaged in the like business of carrying from the same State or Territory to the same other State or Territory, but upon a different way, to divide his or their earnings arising from such business or from any part of such business, is hereby prohibited and declared to be of no effect; and any person or corporation or person and corporation who shall violate or evade this section shall not be entitled to recover or receive any compensation for any such carrying while so violating or evading the provisions hereof.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the railroads leading from the seaboard to the West compete for business which they generally do when the water-ways are open, the products of the country are carried at a reasonable price. Generally, however, when the water-ways are closed during the winter, the great trunk lines meet through their representatives at New York or some other point, and agree that the earnings of the different through lines, without regard to the amount of freight carried by each, shall be brought together and divided, and then proceed to put up the price of carrying from 25 to 50 per cent. Now the very object of the grant of the franchise to these roads, and in many instances the aid given to assist in their construction, was that, running as they do parallel to each other from the East to the West, they would and should enter into a fair competition for the carrying trade from and to different parts of the country, and any agreement between them which defeats this object is contrary to public policy and should be prohibited and such remedies afforded as would prevent it. I drew the amendment hastily, for the reason I had to do so, if I drew it at all, as the bill is being considered hastily; but I think if adopted it will at least tend to accomplish the desired object—and I hope members will scrutinize it with a view to perfect it if it is not as it should be—I especially desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to it, who has so clearly stated (as he always does as to any matter he talks about) the supposed objects of this bill, and I submit to him as well as to the House that if the amendment is sufficient to accomplish the object aimed at it is perhaps of as much importance as the rest of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois may be again read that we may understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not be in order till after the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is voted on. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, section 1, strike out the words "or other means of transportation by common carriers" and insert "ship, steamboat, or other vessel;" so that it will read:

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, in or about operating, running, or using any railroad or railway, or the carriage of any property on or by means of any railroad or railway, ship, steamboat, or other vessel, &c.

And in lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "or other means of transportation by common carriers" and insert "ship, steamboat, or other vessel;" so that it will read:

And which is, or is to be, wholly or partly carried on or by such railroad or railway, ship, steamboat, or other vessel, &c.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a division of that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move to amend the gentleman's motion by striking out of his motion the words "and insert" and all the words following.

Mr. REAGAN. It cannot be done in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is substantially the same thing as a division of the question.

The question being taken on Mr. REAGAN's amendment, there were—ayes 48, noes 13.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that that amendment be again read. I do not know that I understand it.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 46, noes 6.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read section 2 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to allow, return, deliver, do, cause, furnish, or pay, or cause, or suffer, or permit to be allowed, returned, delivered, done, caused, furnished, or paid, any rebate, drawback, commission, sum, act, service, or thing, which shall actually or substantially make, result in, or tend to make the freight, compensation, or reward received from or paid by any corporation, company, person, or party, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any property carried or to be carried in or by one actually or substantially continuous carriage as aforesaid, less or more than the freight charge, compensation, or reward, respectively, received or paid and retained, for the same or substantially the same or similar carriage, act or acts, thing or things, respectively, done or performed, or to be done or performed, for any other corporation, company, person, or party, in, about, or connected with the receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of any other property of the same or substantially the same or similar kind, and done or performed, or which is or are to be, or which should be or have been done or performed at the same or substantially the same time or times, or when the same schedule aforesaid relating thereto shall be in force.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the following amendment:

In line 22, after the word "or," insert the word "should;" so that it will read: Or which should be or should have been done or performed, &c.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the last word. It may seem that this bill contains a great deal of verbosity, and there is no doubt about that fact, but the provisions of this measure, notwithstanding its seeming verbosity, seem to be pretty well understood. It is rather a singular coincidence that the opponents of this bill come from the seaport cities, or nearly all of them from the seaport cities of the country.

The great shipping ports are the ones which derive advantage from the unjust discrimination which now prevails in this country, and when I see gentlemen from Boston, Massachusetts, gentlemen from New York, gentlemen from Philadelphia, and gentlemen from other seaport cities come here and oppose this measure, it strikes me that the assumed verbosity of the measure is rather a pretext than anything else. Gentlemen seem to understand very well its provisions; the bill seems to be well understood by those gentlemen whose interests happen to coincide with their judgments.

Now, sir, the evil which we who live upon the intermediate lines of railroad complain of is that they charge the rates upon freight necessary to pay dividends along the line of these roads upon us These trunk lines from New York and Boston to the West get to competing with one another; they get to cutting each other's throats, as the phrase goes, and the consequence is that the rates of freights they charge upon through freight are far lower than they otherwise would be, and when they come to the intermediate points, fifty or one hundred miles from the starting point, they put up the rates of freights far higher than the shipper who sends the freight the whole way has to pay, and thus secure to the treasury of the companies enough money to pay their expenses and pay their dividends.

Now the object which we who reside in the interior of the country have in view is to prevent a discrimination of this sort and to say, as this law plainly does, notwithstanding the inability of gentlemen to understand it, that we will, if possible, prevent those parties who ship from these great central points upon the shores of the ocean from shipping their freight for a less rate than we have to pay. Consequently one of the provisions is that we shall not be charged more than they are charged, and surely no man ought to complain of that.

Mr. AIKEN. I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee who has presented this bill for a few moments. I take it that this section 2 is simply one to disallow a rebate, an unfortunate term, an unpopular word to use in this connection. As I understand the object of the section it is simply this: that wherever there is retail trade and wholesale trade the transportation company can claim a rate for the transportion at wholesale at less rates than they do at retail. This bill says that that shall be unlawful.

Now, I am in favor of the general provisions of the bill, but in this particular section it seems to me that a discrimination is made which the laws of trade will not recognize. We all know that in dealing at wholesale we always make a better bargain than in dealing at retail.

If I were a farmer in the Northwest and desired to ship a car-load of my products to the eastern market, I ask the gentleman if I could under this bill, if it passes, demand that the railroads should carry my products to market identically at the same rate that the railroad would carry five hundred car-loads for another individual or company dealing in the same article?

I think it is unjust. I do not think that any individual should be privileged to go to a great corporation and say, you shall carry a single car-load of my products at the same rate that you carry for a company that would give every day, probably, during the shipping season an entire train-load of the same product. That is not according to the rules of trade. In all mercantile business we find that if you go to a wholesale merchant you always make a better trade than with a retail merchant.

The word "rebate" means the same thing: that you may get a lesser freight when you ship by wholesale. If I am correct I do not believe that this section will amount to anything. I believe it will be impracticable. What is to prevent a man who is a speculator in grain or cotton or any other product from going privately to the corporation and saying, I will concentrate my trade with you if you will allow me a rebate of a certain per cent. How are you going to reach them, unless that fact is discovered? It is a private contract between two people. I see no reason for loading down the bill with such a provision as that.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is entirely correct in his suggestion as to what the meaning of the section is. It was meant to prevent charging one man $100 for a car-load and another $50. It was meant to do that, whether the party had one car-load or a hundred or a thousand car-loads. The theory of this bill is to try to equalize the cost of freight among the people, the producers, the merchants, and the manufacturers who deal in the products of the country. If the gentleman's theory is correct we are by our legislation to discriminate in favor of those who have large business against those who have smaller business of the same kind; or, if his theory is that by avoiding legislation we shall permit the continuance of such a thing, then we will legislate or omit to legislate in the interests and to the advantage of the men engaged in large business.

The Committee on Commerce, during the Forty-fourth Congress, had a pretty good illustration from sworn testimony of the very principle which the gentleman from South Carolina now advocates. It was made to appear before the committee that the Cleveland Standard Oil Company, by combination with certain railroad companies, had been able to control a large portion of the business, and that by these combinations they were able to secure rebates of about 30 per cent. on the cost of transportation, and to break up a large number of other companies engaged in the production of oil in the oil regions, and to secure a monopoly of the oil business, which constitutes one of the most extensive branches of trade in this country.

Now, why should there be a discrimination in favor of the man who has ten car-loads of freight to transport and against the one who has not that many? One car-load is the unit of measure. All the different cars are hitched on and started from the same place and dropped at the same place. Then why discriminate in favor of the man who has ten car-loads and against the man who has but one?

The man who raises one car-load of grain desires to realize from it the same rate of profit as he who raises ten car-loads. And the merchant who has one car-load of grain to ship to market is entitled to the same facilities of transportation and the same ratio of profit as the one who has ten car-loads of grain to ship. And yet the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] would discriminate against the man who has the one car-load.

The communications on this subject of rebates and drawbacks from numerous persons in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Chicago all unite in saying that the railroads will agree with some particular man or set of men to allow them rebates on certain kinds of business and will refuse to make that allowance to others. That gives them the power to transfer all the business from the many to the few, in the interest of monopoly and combination and fraud against trade. We desire to break that up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CASWELL. I renew it. I do not desire to oppose the general features of this bill; I am very much in favor of them. But there is one feature, if I understand it correctly, which I am in duty bound to oppose.

I understand that this bill provides that the railroad companies shall carry freight over a part of its line for the same rate that it does over its entire line. If I am incorrect in that, then I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has charge of this bill, [Mr. REAGAN,] will correct me. I understand that by this bill the rate of freight per mile must be the same over a part of a road that it is over the entire line of that road.

Mr. REAGAN. In order to exclude all doubt upon this subject, I have been authorized by the Committee on Commerce to move an amendment to cover that point.

Mr. CASWELL. If my friend from Texas will amend the bill so as to take from it that feature, then I have no objection to it and will be in favor of the bill.

But in my opinion this bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce and be revised by that committee. They should be instructed to strike out some of its verbiage and to put in plain common-sense language that will preserve to the people of this country the right to ship their products from one portion of the country to another over these roads without discrimination.

I am opposed to a bill that embodies so much of obscurity that scarcely any railroad company can settle upon what it means unless by an appeal to the courts. Let us recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time. I will favor the bill if they will put it in such shape as will make it practicable.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

Mr CASWELL. Before I yield the floor I desire to inquire of the Chair if it is in order for me at this stage to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think it would be in order at this time.

Mr. CASWELL. The bill is in the House, and I think a motion to recommit is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CASWELL. I do not wish to deprive the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] of an opportunity to make his remarks. But if I have the right I wish before I yield the floor to move to recommit this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I think there will probably be a time for the gentleman to make the motion he indicates, if it is a proper one. I desire, however, to say that I hope the motion will not be made.

I have studied the provisions of this bill, and while it may be a matter of regret that technical legal language may be necessary to meet a condition of things which is of itself a very troublesome one, you cannot by any possibility meet all the shifts and evasions and peculiar phases of trick and idea which have grown up in the business of this class, without knowing thoroughly what you are about, and drawing your "common-law indictment," to use the words of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and doing it with great technicality. Therefore I venture to say that any gentleman who thinks he can put the provisions of this bill into a few simple, untechnical words will find that the bill will not be worth a copper when it is done. I say that after a careful examination of the subject.

Now a word in regard to the matter of rebates, for I have no time for more than that. I do not know anything that excites in my mind a more lively astonishment than for a gentleman representing particularly an agricultural region, and one that has an interest in the business of transportation, to get up here and speak in favor of these rebates. What are they? They are bargains secretly made by which a person to whom the favor is given is able to have his freight transported at a less rate than the public, and at a rate which the agent who makes it will generally swear, if need be, is exactly even with all the rest when he knows it is not even. The boldness, the effrontery, with which these special rates are made to favor secret contracts has become the bane of the whole railway system, until honest men who are in it are praying that there may come some eruption that shall break it up.

How does the system work? Let us take a few examples. At the great points for shipping cattle in the country, a few men, by secret understanding with the railroad officers, have obtained such control of the rates that you cannot ship a hoof without going to them to ship it. They levy black-mail upon every shipper and every cattle-raiser. Any one familiar with the railroad business knows that you cannot ship from Saint Louis or Chicago a solitary head of stock that does not pay its black-mail in this way. The system has grown to such an extent that there is scarcely a shipping-point on any great line of railway where some railroad officer has not a secret understanding with some favored shipper or shippers to divide profits out of secret rates. This evil has gone so far that at various times the Legislatures of the States have been obliged to interfere. Under the name of "fast-freight lines," &c., the directors of railroad companies, by an arrangement between themselves as individuals and themselves as the company, obtain the almost exclusive right to ship freight over the line at certain rates which are not compensatory to the stockholders.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope the gentleman will explain the term "eveners."

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The "eveners" are an organization of men controlling shipments from the stock-yards who, by a direct understanding with the officers of the great lines, have secured rates which are allowed to no one else, and which consequently make it absolutely necessary that everybody desiring to ship shall do so through them. These rebates are oftentimes large. They are now understood to be about $15 on a car-load of stock.

Mr. REA obtained the floor.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I would like to go on a few moments longer.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. REA] will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REA. I will do so.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. This evil is not confined to any special class of business but extends itself to all, and the temptation to fraud is so great that, in spite of everything the managers of railways can do, this abuse has passed from the great magnates of the companies down to the lesser agents, so that at every competing point in the country you will now find an irresponsible agent of a railroad company receiving perhaps $1,200 or $1,500 a year, who has the right to make rates. Thus there is put into his hands a temptation to make special rates for the benefit of anybody who will pay him for the favor. It is a matter of notoriety in the railway business that this is done wherever these agents choose to be fraudulent. To prevent these secret arrangements it has become an absolute necessity to the carrying business of the country that there shall be some one unit of charge publicly fixed, so that the whole country may know what it is and that all business, whatever it may be, shall be done under this uniform rule. I have known, for example, a miller upon a line of railroad to be broken up because his neighbor over the way, having a secret partnership of some kind with the freight agent of the railroad, obtained a rebate that enabled him to destroy his competitor in business while at the same time cheating the railroad company. Publicity is the only safeguard, and the public themselves should be made the parties interested in rooting out the evil. So long as there is any system of secret bargains which may be made by the agents of the railroad as they please, whenever their favor is bought or whenever they have a personal interest, so long you will find there will be no profitable business along the road except one in which the officers of the road have some controlling influence.

Mr. McCOOK. Does the gentleman think that this bill as drawn will break up the infamous system he has described?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I believe it will do more toward breaking it up than any bill that has ever been introduced, and that honest men who have bona fide interests in railways ought to hail it as a measure that will make honest work possible; and I affirm it is not possible in that business to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KENNA obtained the floor and said: In order that the time of the gentleman from Ohio might be extended, I asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. REA] to yield his time. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. REA. Mr. Speaker, during my service here I have not seen proper to trouble the House by talking, except on one or two occasions. Permit me to say that the bill now before this House is in my judgment one of very great importance. I believe no proposition more vital to the business interests of the country can be presented than the one now under consideration.

The question in the first place presents itself whether Congress has the power to indicate the proposed legislation. And I desire here to state that, as a strict constructionist of the Constitution, if I believed the power did not exist in and under that instrument to enact the legislation proposed, then I should oppose it. I do not think Congress ought to arrogate to itself powers which do not belong to it, but those which do, it should not shrink from exercising when the needs of the country require it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] tells us the power exists in Congress to pass this legislation, that the power is exclusively in Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but that we ought not to do it, that we ought not to exercise the power the Constitution gives us because, if we do, in the end we will get beaten. What does it mean? It is that although the Constitution of the country authorizes and makes the Congress of the United States the exclusive body to regulate this commerce, yet if you touch it the railroad companies will send men here to control Congress itself. It amounts to this: let them do as they please now, because if you attempt to control them they will do as they please anyhow. We are just where we commenced if we do, and we have lost nothing in the effort.

That power exists in the Congress to regulate interstate commerce, I have no question. There is a long line of judicial authority on that question which is incontrovertible. The problem now presents itself that the Congress of the United States is the one power in this country which can regulate this interstate commerce, and if the Congress of the United States does not do it, then it cannot and will not be done. Hence the question which presents itself to us is will Congress attempt to give the relief to the country that they can give and the only power which can do it under the Constitution or law, or will you shrink back and say the great monopolies which the gentlemen have said are overriding this country must not be touched or else they will assert their authority over us and redouble their energy against us?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the legislation proposed here is not to hurt any one. I have examined this bill with the best ability I have, and if I should see it was to destroy the railroads of the country, then I would not vote for it, because I do not wish to cripple or to injure them. But, sir, it seems to me this bill is in the line of right and of justice between shippers and the roads.

As has been well said, this bill only proposes to give equality of rates between shippers and to prevent drawbacks. That is all there is in it. Is not that right? Have we come to the time in this country when a few men anywhere have exclusive rights upon the railroads of the United States which every other man does not enjoy? The common sense of this country revolts at such an idea. He who has five car-loads of cattle to ship has the same right to ship them at the same rate per car as he who owns a hundred car-loads.

Mr. AIKEN. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question just here it will perhaps save the House from hearing me for five minutes hereafter. What I wish to ask is this: if a man hires a laborer for one day is he not willing to pay more for that one day's labor than pro rata at that rate for twelve months?

Mr. REA. I might in the instance given by the gentleman be willing to do that, but if I wanted five day's work done I am willing to give five laborers for doing that work in one day precisely what I would give one workman for doing it in five days. It is the same proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROGDEN. I move a proviso to come in at the end of the second section.

Mr. BEEBE. I wish to inquire whether under the order adopted by unanimous consent the vote was not to be taken on this bill at this time?

Mr. KENNA. It is now half past four, and the only understanding was that the previous question should not be called before half past four. There was no understanding at all it should be called at half past four.

Mr ATKINS. I thought it was the distinct understanding of the House as announced by the gentleman from Texas that the vote was to be taken on the previous question at half past four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. REAGAN. Not at all.

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman will examine the RECORD he will find on the contrary the agreement was that the previous question should not be called before half past four, and there was no understanding that it should be called at that hour.

Mr. ATKINS. Then we have been deceived as to what the understanding was.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me read what did take place.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose to interfere with the gentleman's retaining the floor, but perhaps he would prefer occupying the floor at another time. I propose, if it be agreeable to the House, that it shall be ordered by unanimous consent that at the close of the morning hour on Saturday this bill be considered, and the previous question not called earlier than half past four o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. Is not that an indication that the previous question was to be called at half past four?

Mr. KENNA. There is no such implication that it should be called at that time. The understanding was by unanimous consent that the previous question should not be called earlier than that hour.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order to move to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the previous question was not to be called before half past four o'clock. That hour has now arrived. It is within the control of the House if the previous question is called.

Mr. ATKINS. I have risen to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The practice under the rules is to allow the friends of the bill to test the sense of the House before the motion indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee is entertained.

Mr. REAGAN. We have not been able to get through the various sections of this bill. Gentlemen have been disposed to occupy the time in debate. I desire at least the privilege for members to offer amendments to the bill, and with that view I think it better to let it go over as unfinished business before calling the previous question.

Mr. BEEBE. Does the gentleman contemplate that the bill shall come up as unfinished business on Monday?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; my idea is that it should go over Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands it, if the House should adjourn now, this bill will come up as unfinished business on Tuesday after the reading of the Journal. If the previous question should be seconded and the main question ordered, it would come up on Monday after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BEEBE. If it will come up as unfinished business on Tuesday, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a parliamentary question. What were the terms of the order under which the House is now acting? I do not understand that the bill was made a special order from day to day until disposed of, although that may have been the case. If not, it merely takes its chance of being disposed of to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause to be read Rule 56.

Mr. REAGAN. If I can get the consent of the House to offer an amendment to the fourth section, I will then call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In connection with the parliamentary question of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] the Chair directs the Clerk to read Rule 56.

The Clerk read as follows:

56. The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.—March 18, 1860.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Clerk read from the paragraph on page 316 of the Manual the statement beginning with the words "and sometimes."

The Clerk read as follows:

And sometimes the words "and from day to day until disposed of" are omitted. Journal 1, 31, page 522, (in which case it is a special order for the day named only,) and if the matter made a special order is not taken up, or, if taken up, is left undisposed of on the day fixed, thereafter it loses its specialty.—Journal, 1, 31, pages 631 and 897.

Mr. HALE. Now, my experience has been that where a bill is by unanimous consent made a special order if the gentleman in charge of it does not care to see that it is made a continuing order from day to day, his day in court is the day named and that only, unless he gets the main question ordered upon the bill which in this case has not been done.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the consent of the House to offer this amendment, and then I will call the previous question.

In line 4, section 4, page 6, strike out the word "freight," where it first occurs, and insert in lieu thereof the words "per car-load as;" so that it will read:

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, receiver, trustee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to charge or receive any greater freight per car-load, as compensation or reward for the carriage of any property carried, &c.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered some time ago by the gentleman from Texas has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. BEEBE. What has become of my motion that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his motion?

Mr. BEEBE. If the gentleman from Texas will now call the previous question I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I will call the previous question after this amendment is received as pending.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire, if the Chair will allow me, to say there were several instances in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses where, when a bill was named for a day and not from day to day, the Speaker held it did not, unless the main question was ordered, go over as unfinished business.

Mr. BROGDEN. I claim I was recognized by the Chair and am ahead of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. Am I recognized to offer the amendment I have indicated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair first desires to answer the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman if his construction of the rules is correct when he considers this bill would be again in order?

Mr. BURCHARD. It would not come up again at all. Bills have been frequently killed when assigned to a particular day without the addition of the words "from day to day thereafter until disposed of," by somebody moving to adjourn; if the House adjourns that ends the bill so far as an opportunity of reaching it again is concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was because they were not called up when they were in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I desire to enter the amendment I have indicated to the fourth section.

Mr. PAGE. I object to an amendment of the fourth section of the bill when we are considering the second section.

Mr. BROGDEN. I submit that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question cannot be demanded until the gentleman from North Carolina yields the floor.

Mr. BROGDEN. I was recognized by the Chair and my amendment is germane to the second section of the bill. I ask that it be read.

Mr. REAGAN. I have called for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas could not demand the previous question while the gentleman from North Carolina was on the floor. As soon as the gentleman from North Carolina has occupied his time the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BROGDEN, which was to add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company or corporation from making special rates or contracts for the transportation of freight and persons on land and water within the several States and Territories.

Mr. REAGAN. I now demand the previous question on the bill and the pending amendments.

Mr. WAIT. And pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put on Mr. WAIT's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 65.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. Those who want to kill this bill will vote "ay."

Mr. PAGE. Of course we all know that.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 106, not voting 108; as follows:

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. MARTIN, is detained at his room by sickness in his family. He is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, understanding that nothing but the pending bill would be reached this evening, and that no vote would likely be taken upon it, is at his quarters, attending to duties connected with the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which he is a member.

Mr. HERBERT. My colleague, Mr. SHELLEY, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Indiana.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. FINLEY, is paired on this question with Mr. BOYD, of Illinois.

Mr. CAMP. My colleagues from New York, Mr. BAKER and Mr. QUINN, are paired.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I am paired with Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut. This not being a political question, I consider myself free to vote and have voted. I desire also to announce that my colleague, General BUTLER, is paired with Judge TUCKER, of Virginia, and that my colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with Mr. GOODE, of Virginia.

Mr. WATSON. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky. This not being a political question, I have voted in the negative.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to give notice that I have called the previous question in order that this bill may come up when the House again meets; but I do so with the understanding that should it be now seconded and the main question ordered, when the bill is again reached I will move to reconsider the vote ordering the main question in order to open the bill to further amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) authorizing Lieutenant T. B. M. Mason, United States Navy, to accept a medal conferred by the King of Italy for extinguishing a fire on a powder-ship.

GEORGE WILLIAMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers and accompanying papers upon the bill (H. R. No. 4412) for the relief of George Williams; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

ARREARS OF PAY AND BOUNTY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, setting forth that after June 30, 1878, payment of claims for arrears of pay and bounty due discharged soldiers of the regular and volunteer service will cease if reappropriations to continue such payments are not made prior to that date; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The House this morning passed Senate bill No. 903, for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and Colorado, and in Washington Territory. At my instance the word "Colorado" was inserted in the body of the bill and also in the title. Since then I find that such insertion will bring the bill in conflict with a bill upon the same subject passed the other day. I therefore ask unanimous consent to eliminate the word "Colorado" both from the body of the bill and the title.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN NEW YORK.

Mr. MULLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4802) for the construction of a public building for use by the United States Government in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

MONONGAHELA CEMETERY.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4803) donating four condemned cannon and sixteen cannon balls to the Monongahela Cemetery to be placed in a lot held as a free burrial-ground for ex-soldiers, sailors, and marines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. COX, of New York. The bill in relation to the life-saving service, reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] was made a special order for Thursday last. The gentleman now agrees that it may be made a special order for two weeks from next Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until disposed of. I ask consent that that be done.

Mr. PAGE. Will it conflict with any other special order?

Mr. COX, of New York. It will not conflict with California.

Mr. PAGE. Will it conflict with any other special order?

Mr. COX, of New York. Not with any of prior date.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BREWER: A paper relating to the pension claim of George E. Warner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LYNDE: The petition of the governor of Chickasaw Nation, for the payment of interest on trust funds held by the United States—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. McMAHON: The petition of Charles Perkins and 84 other wounded soldiers, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 2059) for the equalization of pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of John Sherdan and 19 other disabled soldiers at Augusta Home, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, papers relating to the pension claim of Catherine Lee—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 13, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, showing that after June 30, 1878, payment of claims for arrears of pay and bounty due discharged soldiers of the regular and volunteer forces will cease if reappropriations to continue such payments are not made prior to that date; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a draught of a bill to prevent frauds upon the customs revenue, and recommending its favorable consideration; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army proposing a substitute for section 5485 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to attorney-fees in claims for bounty, &c., and a brief of certain correspondence wherein the necessity of the proposed amendment is shown; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of William R. Browne and Thomas Fitch, citizens of Connecticut, praying that they may be paid the sum of $20,000, with interest from 1855, out of the Japanese indemnity fund on account of certain losses sustained by them; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions of the Osceola Council, No. 23, Order of United American Mechanics, of Brooklyn, New York, against any change in the tariff duties on imports which would affect American labor; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of George E. Matheuny, Benjamin O. Durant, Moore & Angell, and numerous others, hat manufacturers in the city of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for the abolition of the duty levied on hatters' black silk plush, which is manufactured in France and is not manufactured at all in this country, and protects no industry of ours. It is a raw material and cannot be used for any other purpose than in the manufacture of hats. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present the petition of G. L. Dyer, master in the United States Navy, who represents that he has been injured by the promotion of one U. M. Wood, who was not by law entitled to promotion, and he prays for such reparation of his injuries as Congress shall adjudge proper. I would have presented this petition some days since but for the fact that I have been absent. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented the petition of R. W. Wilson & Co. and others, engaged in the manufacture and sale of silk hats, praying for the abolition of the duty on hatters' black silk plush, or its reduction to not more than 10 per cent. ad valorem; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOOTH. I present the following resolution of the District Council Sovereigns of Industry of the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Council of the District of Columbia, Sovereigns of Industry, representing two thousand families in said District, does hereby respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to enact such a law as will insure full weight to purchasers of coal and compel coal dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered in the District of Columbia.

I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of William Wallace and 150 others, citizens of Columbia, South Carolina, praying for the repeal of the clause in the national-banking laws which levies a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating notes of State banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAUNDERS presented the petition of Sarah Ireland, of Sarpy County, Nebraska, praying for a pension on account of the services to the Government of her two sons during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT presented the memorial of Marder Luse & Co., of San Francisco, California, remonstrating against the passage of a law to refund to Miller & Richard the amount of a fine imposed upon them as a penalty for undervaluing a lot of goods through the custom-house at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of R. H. Hewitt and others, printers, stereotypers, &c., of California, praying for the passage of a law imposing a tariff duty of thirty cents per pound upon all stereotype and electrotype plates imported into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of A. J. Johnson and William M. Merrill, of Boston, and other mechanics of that city and vicinity. They "respectfully represent that they have seen presented in the House of Representatives a resolution to enforce what is known as the eight-hour law, that is to pay laborers employed on Government works as much pay for eight hours' labor as the same class of men are paid for ten hours' work elsewhere," and they conceive that this is a "great outrage to those mechanics who from political or other reasons have never been able to get employed in the navy-yards or other public works. The extra pay these few will get comes out of us," they say, "in the way of taxes on the great body of the industry of the country;" and they assert that "not one in ten thousand of the mechanics or laborers of the country can be employed on Government works, and those who get this employment are the henchmen of the members of Congress for whose election they work, as every one familiar with the subject knows."

They also represent that they are "not among the thriving laborers of the country. When it is seen that in all agricultural and farming occupations there can from the necessity of the case be no such thing as the regulation or limitation of the hours of labor, and that this department of industry requires more labor than all the other departments together, and that the burden of taxation falls more heavily upon this interest than on any other," it seems strange to them, they assert, that any one fit to go to Congress should advocate the paying of political laborers 20 per cent. more than better mechanics elsewhere can get. They respectfully pray "that the eight-hour law be repealed, or so enforced as that the men who get on Government work shall not be paid any more than others can get, or if they can, that their extra pay shall come out of the salaries of the members of Congress who get them the work."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire how many signatures there are to that petition.

Mr. MORRILL. It is signed by A. J. Johnson, William M. Merrill, A. F. Heath, Thomas R. Harriman, Austin P. Carter, S. P. Hall, and Horace A. Mills; and they assert in a postscript that they could get every honest mechanic to sign it if they had the time to present this paper to them.

Mr. HOAR. They found five or six honest mechanics in Massachusetts who have signed it so far.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of Oscar L. Clyde, of Minnesota, praying a correction of his record in the War Department, and that he have an honorable discharge, and that he be paid the back pay and bounty claimed to be due him; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Josiah Kellogg, late private Company G, Forty-Sixth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of H. G. C. Warder, of Virginia, administratrix of the estate of Samuel Warder, deceased, praying that her claim for compensation for property alleged to have been taken from the estate of the decedent and appropriated by the United States military forces during the late war, and which was referred to the southern claims commission and disallowed, may be recommitted to that commission for further consideration; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Richmond, Virginia, in favor of the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the petition of Anna M. Clark, of Florida, praying confirmation of a certain private land claim in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. A. McClannahan, of Knoxville, Tennessee, praying compensation for the alleged use and occupancy of her property by United States military forces during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 380) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Toledo, Ohio, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1896) for the relief of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis in the State of California, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of War with reference to an appropriation for wagon roads in Colorado and New Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

No. 1235) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1235) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house at the heads of Port Orford, in Oregon, on the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1237) to declare the legal effect of permits granted by the President of the United States to purchase products of the insurrectionary States; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1238) to levy a tax on the sale of spirituous and malt liquors in bar-rooms and all places where intoxicants are sold by the drink in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EUSTIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1239) for the relief of Edward H. Wilson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1240) to provide for steamship mail service between Galveston, Texas, and Vera Cruz, Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

NORFOLK HARBOR.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with the late report of the advisory board relating to the harbor of Norfolk, Virginia, together with the estimates for the work recommended.

POST-ROUTE IN GEORGIA.

Mr. GORDON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post-route from Dublin, Lawrence County, Georgia, to Red Bluff, Montgomery County, Georgia.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARNUM and Mr. BUTLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. HILL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4283) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

CHARLES COLLINS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Some days ago I made an adverse report on the bill (S. No. 980) for the relief of Charles Collins, and on my motion the bill was indefinitely postponed. I should like to have the bill and the papers accompanying it recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with the accompanying papers. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

JOHN C. BIRDSELL'S PATENT.

Mr. HOAR. The bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell was recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and I ask unanimous consent that this case may be restored to its old place on the Calendar. The bill was reported from the committee, and after the committee had made their report and the bill had been on the Calendar some weeks one of the members of the Committee on Patents recollected that there had been a communication made to him in behalf of a respondent who desired to oppose the claim; and therefore the committee requested that the bill be recommitted to them. A full hearing has been given the respondent. That being an accident for which the petitioner was not in fault, but an accidental forgetfulness on the part of the members of the committee, we ask unanimous consent that the case may stand in its old place on the Calendar. I do not propose to call it up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar in its former position before the recommittal.

PARDON OF ALLEGED DESERTERS.

Mr. SARGENT. Some time since the Committee on Military Affairs reported back adversely the bill (S. No. 1094) for the pardon of certain deserters from the United States Army in 1848, and moved its indefinite postponement, and it was indefinitely postponed by the Senate. That was done, I think, under an error as to the intention of the bill, as it was supposed to be covered by another bill which the committee at that time reported. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered, and that it be referred again to the Committee on Military Affairs; and then I have an amendment which I wish to send to the committee.

These deserters were thirty-nine or forty men who some thirty years ago went in what was called Stephenson's Regiment, the First New York Cavalry, around the Horn to California. They were really armed emigrants. Under the influence of the gold fever, which at that time existed, some forty members of the regiment deserted and went to the mines. There were very peculiar circumstances excusing the act of these parties. Nearly everybody left; captains of ships left their ships, &c., and the wonder is that not more than forty members of this regiment left it. I ask that the bill be sent back to the committee in order that they may consider the propriety of giving these persons a discharge. Some of them are now dead. Many of them are among the first citizens of our State. They were the Argonauts. Many of them since that time have made good reputations in the community, having acquired property, &c., and they want this stigma, made in time of youth, thirty years ago, and under very peculiar circumstances, removed from their record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered for the purpose of recommittal to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state in connection with what has been said by the Senator from California, as the bill was reported by myself on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, that our judgment was that the bill just now mentioned was covered by Senate bill No. 1114, to amend the one hundred and third article of war, which was also reported from the committee at that time. Since that report was made, however, a fact has been called to the attention of the committee, being a proclamation of the President, which I understand bears very materially upon the question at issue, about the time referred to by the Senator from California. The Military Committee did not examine that proclamation, because their attention was not called to it. For that reason I join with the request of the Senator from California, because the committee doubtless desire to do right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the vote will be reconsidered and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I ask leave to submit an amendment to the bill, that it may go to the committee with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OREGON CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon." I do not think it will require very long to consider it. The bill merely extends the time enabling a railroad company to complete the rest of its road.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

JOHN F. SUTHERLIN & BROTHER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish the Senate to take action on the bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana. It is a unanimous report from the Finance Committee. It involves a settlement with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of some unsettled taxes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a bill pending, of which the Senator from Oregon asks the present consideration.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator from Oregon will allow me to call up this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly, if it does not lead to discussion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senate will pass the bill. It is a matter that is unanimously reported from the Finance Committee.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, to strike out all after the word "distillers," in line 6, and to insert:

By receiving in full discharge thereof the amount of tax due upon the actual number of gallons of proof-spirits produced by them, without further claim in the nature of damages, penalty, or other charge.

So as to make the bill read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to settle the claim or account of the United States against said John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana, distillers, by receiving in full discharge thereof the amount of tax due upon the actual number of gallons of proof spirits produced by them, without further claim in the nature of damages, penalty, or other charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I also desire action upon the bill (H. R. No. 1889) for the relief of David W. Cheeseman, of Lake City, in Lake County, in the State of Oregon, which was reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from Indiana for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Indiana had better not call up that bill this morning. It will probably have to be discussed a little.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well. If there is any objection of course I shall not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill which has just been read at length is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLAN. That bill seems to be one of an important character. I have not had an opportunity of examining the bill, and I desire to have such an opportunity. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not ask that the bill be considered now during the morning hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that the bill has been on the Calendar something over a month now, and it was reported from the Committee on Railroads. I am very anxious to get as early action as possible. At the same time, if the Senator from Minnesota or any other Senator desires further time to examine the matter I shall not press it this morning, but give notice that to-morrow morning, as soon as the morning business is over, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill. I will simply state in this connection that the bill merely proposes an extension, under restrictions and conditions, of a land grant made in 1870 to enable this company to complete its road. The road has been completed with the exception of some ninety miles, and this is simply an extension of time to enable them to complete the road.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no objection to a reasonable extension of time to any road the construction of which has been authorized by Congress, of course, but I simply desire to look into the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all that this is; but that the Senator may have an opportunity to examine the bill I will let the matter go over until to-morrow, giving notice that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall endeavor to have the bill considered, and I hope the Senate will grant me that privilege.

POTTAWATOMIE LAND PATENTS.

Mr. INGALLS. I was absent while the Calendar was under consideration a few days ago, and a bill which I had reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs was laid over to await my return. It is a matter affecting a few of my constituents and I ask the Senate to oblige me by considering it now. It is Senate bill No. 766.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 766) to legalize certain patents issued to members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Indian Affairs proposed to amend the bill in line 5, after the word "Kansas," by striking out the words "in accordance with" and inserting "under;" in line 8, before the word "eight," inserting the words "sixth and;" and in the same line, after the word "eighth," striking out the word "article" and inserting "articles;" so as to make the bill read:

That the patents issued April 15, 1871, to certain Pottawatomie Indians in the State of Kansas, under the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, of November 15, 1861, and the sixth and eighth articles of the treaty between the United States and said tribe of Indians, concluded February 27, 1867, be, and the same are hereby declared to be, valid and in full force and effect to the same extent as they would have been had said patentees become naturalized citizens of the United States prior to the issuing of said patents: Provided, That this act shall only apply to patents for lands for which conveyances have been made in good faith by the patentees subsequent to the issuing of their patents.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENTRIES UNDER SOLDIERS' HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. No. 989) for the relief of certain settlers on public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on said entries of public lands. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5 of section 1, after the word "commissions," to insert "and excess payments;" in line 17, after the word "commissions," to insert "and excess payments;" and at the end of the section to insert "and shall be payable out of the appropriation to refund purchase-money on lands erroneously sold by the United States;" so as to make the section read:

That in all cases where it shall, upon due proof being made, appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that innocent parties have paid the fees and commissions and excess payments required upon the location of claims under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to enable honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphan children, to acquire homesteads on the public lands of the United States,' and amendments thereto," approved March 3, 1873, and now incorporated in section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which said claims were, after such location, found to be fraudulent and void, and the entries or locations made thereon canceled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to repay to such innocent parties the fees and commissions and excess payments paid by them, upon the surrender of the receipts issued therefor by the receivers of public moneys, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and shall be payable out of the appropriation to refund purchase-money on lands erroneously sold by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 7, after the word "commissions," to insert "and excesses;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. In all cases where homestead or timber-culture entries or other entries of public lands have heretofore or shall hereafter be canceled for conflict, or where, from any cause, the entry has been erroneously allowed and cannot be confirmed, the receiver of public moneys of the land office in which such entry was made shall repay to the person who made such entry the fees and commissions and excesses paid upon the same, upon the surrender of the duplicate receipt and the execution of a proper relinquishment of all claims to said land, whenever such entry shall have been duly canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 1, after the word "shall," to strike out "be furnished with funds as disbursing officer of the United States to make the payments" and insert "repay such fees, commissions, and excesses the repayment of which is," and after the word "act," in line 5, to insert "out of any money in his hands received in payment of fees and commissions and excesses on like entries of public lands;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The receiver of public moneys shall repay such fees, commissions, and excesses the repayment of which is provided for in the second section of this act, out of any money in his hands received in payment of fees and commissions and excesses on like entries of public lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There ought to be an explanation of the bill. It appears to be an important one and needs some explanation.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not a very important bill, although it is to some persons who paid fees on entries which subsequently were canceled. The Committee on Public Lands makes quite a lengthy printed report on the bill. The Senator may remember, and the Senate may remember, that in 1873 a law was passed authorizing soldiers who had entered upon eighty acres of land as a homestead to take eighty acres in addition. There was not the provision, which we have put in such measures subsequently, providing that it should be contiguous land. Under the operation of this bill certain parties made fraudulent applications, and these were sold to innocent parties. These innocent parties located them, paid their fees upon them, and the frauds were subsequently detected at the Land Office, and the parties lost the moneys which they paid to their vendors, and also the commissions and fees they paid the General Government. The object of this bill is to pay them back the fees and commissions. The Government of course does not desire to retain moneys collected under such circumstances. It is not a very large amount any way, but is considerable to these individuals. There are precedents for this action, but not applying to payments of this character. The whole thing is very fully set out in the report by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, which can be read if the Senator desires.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; I do not want that. I ask what section of country does this bill specially affect?

Mr. SARGENT. All sections of the country. It does not affect one more than another; Iowa, Indiana, Minnesota, California, Oregon, everywhere where these additional soldiers' homesteads were located. Many of the entries were just and correct and the parties got the benefit of them.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator is it so general as to be scattered all over the country? If so, it must involve a very considerable amount.

Mr. SARGENT. No; only a few in every State wherever these fraudulent claims have been located.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the bill is reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; with a printed report.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERCOURSE WITH MEXICO.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask consent to take up certain resolutions which I offered on the 8th instant, in relation to our policy in intercourse with Mexico, with a view to postpone their consideration until to-morrow, when I desire to submit some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to take from the table certain resolutions which he names; is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. What are the resolutions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent resolutions touching the relations of the United States of America with the Republic of Mexico. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama, and the resolutions are before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that they be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF FLOUR.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to take up House bill No. 4425. It will not occupy more than a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4425) to alter and amend a law of the District of Columbia relative to the inspection of flour was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill amends section 6 of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, approved August 21, 1871, entitled "An act relating to inspection of flour," so as to read:

That all and every barrel and half barrel of flour manufactured in the District, or brought to the same for sale, shall be subject to the examination of the inspector, by boring, searching, and trying it through with an instrument not exceeding five-eighths of an inch in diameter, to be provided by the inspector for that purpose, who shall afterward plug up the hole with a round plug, made of soft wood, so as to prevent the entrance of water; and if the inspector shall judge the same to be merchantable according to the direction of this act he shall, at the time of inspecting, mark or brand on the head or quarter of every barrel and half barrel of flour, in letters one half inch in length, the word "Georgetown" if inspected in Georgetown, and "Washington" if inspected in Washington, together with the word or words designating the degree of fineness which he shall, at the time of inspection, determine said flour to be entitled to, with the exception of the degree of superfine, which he shall mark or brand over the quarter; and the several degrees in quality shall be distinguished as follows: Family extra, superfine, fine, and first middlings. And for the inspection of which the said inspector shall have and receive of the owner or agent of said flour, for each and every barrel and half barrel, one cent and one drawing of flour for all inspected in Washington or Georgetown; and every barrel or half barrel of flour which shall prove, on examination thereof, to be unmerchantable, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, the said inspector shall mark on the head or quarter with a broad arrow, and no barrel or half barrel of flour not examined and branded by the inspector as aforesaid shall be sold within the District under penalty of $1 for each and every barrel or half barrel, to be paid by the person or persons so offending.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the bill in line 27, by striking out the word "inspection" and inserting "inspector."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES J. WARING.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. No. 251) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia, which was unanimously reported from the Committee on Finance on the 23d of April, and it will take but a few moments for its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 251) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for refunding to James J. Waring eight hundred and ninety dollars, in gold, and one cent, on account of that amount having been paid by him on a portion of the steam-plow machinery imported by him, which was ordered when the same was duty free, but a portion of which did not arrive in the United States until after duty was established on the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DORSEY. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4246, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senator will give way after it is taken up and allow me to call up a small bill.

Mr. DORSEY. The bill comes up after the morning hour as unfinished business. The morning hour has not quite expired, and I think we shall get through with the bill in a short time. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania one moment.

WILLIAM BRINDLE.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. No. 2132.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2132) to pay for clerical services and extraordinary expenses under the seventh section of the act of August 18, 1856, in the Pawnee land district in Kansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

In accordance with the seventh section of the act of August 18, 1856, and the settlement of the account of William Brindle, receiver of public moneys and disbursing agent in the Pawnee land district in Kansas, under and in accordance with that act, and the report by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress on January 23, 1861, as required by the act, the bill appropriates $4,713 to be placed to the credit of Brindle, late receiver, to bear date from January 26, 1861, being the date of settlement and report of the account.

The Committee on Finance reported an amendment, to insert at the end of the second section the words "reserving, nevertheless, the right of appeal to either party from the judgment of the said court;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the suit now pending in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, at May sessions, 1877, No. 4, brought by the United States against William Brindle, shall not be withdrawn, discontinued, nor abandoned by the United States without the written request or consent in writing of the said William Brindle, filed of record therein; and in the trial of said cause, the said court shall hear and determine all disputes and differences between the United States and the said William Brindle in reference to his various accounts as receiver and acting disbursing agent of public money in the Pawnee land district in Kansas, and also in relation to his accounts as special receiver of Indian trust moneys received and expended under the Indian treaties of May 6, and May 30, 1854, as well under said Indian treaties as under the laws of the United States; and the said William Brindle, in the trial of said cause, shall be permitted and be entitled to make defense and claim set-off in his favor in said court if said court shall determine him to be entitled thereto, with the same effect as if said suit were commenced by an individual against the said William Brindle; and said set-off shall not be barred by any statute of limitations. And should the said court, in the said trial, determine that there is a balance due to the said William Brindle upon said accounts, the court shall certify the amount so found to be due to him to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for payment out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, reserving, nevertheless, the right of appeal to either party from the judgment of the said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NUMIS H. COVERDALE.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. DORSEY. I yielded the floor for a moment to the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose of considering a bill which has been considered and passed. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish the Senator from Arkansas would give way to my colleague to pass a House bill to which there will be no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a House bill which will lead to no debate.

Mr. DORSEY. I yield for a moment.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3121) for the relief of Numis H. Coverdale.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Numis H. Coverdale of $6,718, being the balance of the amount of money reserved on payments made to him on behalf of his contracts of July 27, 1863, and March 29, 1864.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to state the circumstances of this case.

Mr. HOAR. Has the bill been before any committee of this body?

Mr. BAYARD. There is a report from the House Committee on Naval Affairs. The Senator from California will explain the case.

Mr. SARGENT. The report was made in the House by a colleague of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS;] I believe a very careful man. The Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate did not make a written report in the case because the report of the House committee is so full in all its particulars and so correct, as we discovered by our examination of the case, that it was entirely unnecessary; and we reported the bill back with this report accompanying it.

The facts in the case are that in 1863 or 1864 Mr. Coverdale, the beneficiary of this bill, made a contract with the Navy Department to deliver white oak at the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and also a contract to deliver it at Brooklyn, New York. By the terms of the contract, as was usual in those days, 20 per cent. of the sum due was reserved on the amount he delivered up to the completion of the contract until the rest should be delivered. Under this contract the party went on in good faith and did deliver the white oak at these two navy-yards until the amount of the reservation amounted to $6,719.15.

After this, he had all the white oak to complete his contracts ready to ship from Wilmington, when, on account of a raid made by confederate forces into Maryland, cutting the communication between Havre de Grace and Baltimore, the military officer in command of the United States forces at Havre de Grace sent a requisition for all vessels at Wilmington and other places, to be immediately sent to Havre de Grace to furnish means of communication to transport troops and supplies, &c., from Havre de Grace to Baltimore and Washington. The vessels which were then loading with this lumber to fulfill these contracts were seized and were taken to Havre de Grace and were detained there for weeks. Meanwhile the time during which the lumber could be delivered expired and a forfeiture occurred, not by the fault of this party, but by the fault of the Government, if there was any fault, or from the emergency which so arose causing a failure of the fulfillment with the Government, leaving the reservation still in the hands of the Government. The party offered to deliver white oak from other places, but the officers at these yards refused to take the oak excepting coming from Wilmington and of the exact character described. The result was that the party, without his own fault, has been left without the payment of this percentage. We think it is only just and right to him that the Government should pay this money over to him, which was the ascertained value at that time of the goods which he did deliver, their further delivery being prevented by the act of the Government itself. On these principles, thinking the equity entirely with this party, we concurred with the House in recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the contract was not completed on account of the refusal of the Government, after this lapse of time, to receive the goods when the contractor offered to go on and finish the contract at the same price?

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say that. I stated that, at the time in 1864 when the party found the Government had seized the vessels which he had brought to transport the lumber, he then offered to furnish other lumber, but the Department declined to receive that; and the result of it was that he was unable to fulfill his contract at all except to the extent that he had up to the time of the seizure of the vessels.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why could he not have fulfilled the contract, but for the lapse of time, after that? After the expiration of the time, did he offer to go on and complete the contract?

Mr. SARGENT. He was treated as in default, and the Department refused to receive any further compliance with it. They purchased other lumber to fulfill the contract at a cost over Coverdale's contract price.

Mr. COCKRELL. After the Government had prevented him from fulfilling the contract, did he offer to go on and complete it at the same price? That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. SARGENT. The Government needed this oak for a particular purpose. He was prevented from fulfilling his contract by the cause which I have mentioned. The Government then went on and bought it of other parties, and did not need it of him, and would not receive it from him. They declared him in default, his contract forfeited, and bought from other parties. The amount of percentage coming to him was 20 per cent. of the contract price which he was to receive, and they held it as security that he would keep his contract within the time limited. This is not a gratuity to him at all, but it is simply the honest value of the lumber that had been furnished up to that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. The point I was making is this: this amount was reserved in order to secure the completion of the contract, and the Government prevented him from completing the contract within the time specified. He was willing after that, as the Government was the party in default, to go on and complete his contract.

Mr. SARGENT. He was, but the Government did not need the lumber at that time. They bought it of other parties.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government refused to let him go on and complete his contract?

Mr. SARGENT. So I understand.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know this gentleman. He was greatly damnified by the action of the Government. In consequence of his not being able to get this money, his creditors came down upon him; and he, a man who was in comfortable circumstances, was sold out, and to-day is working for his support, whereas the Government is keeping in the Treasury the 20 per cent. due him on lumber it actually received. I think if every member of the Senate understood the case there would not be the slightest objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston;

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of Friday's session, being the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DORSEY. Before the Senate proceeds to the actual consideration of this bill, I wish to say a word or two in regard to the general character of it.

As it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives it appropriated $33,140,000, in round numbers. The Senate Committee on Appropriations have added enough to make the amount as reported to the Senate $33,996,000, which is short of the estimates $2,431,000 and $109,000 less than was appropriated for the same service last year.

The most important change made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in this bill is in regard to the compensations to railroads, the increase in that one item being $535,000. The other increases are small in amount. In the matter of letter-carriers, the committee have added $135,000 additional, which makes the same sum that was appropriated three years ago for this service. It provides nothing for increase or growth. In regard to the letter-carrier system I will say that it is about the only bureau of the Post-Office Department that pays its way. Four cities in the United States pay a surplus into the Treasury from this service alone of $897,000, New York paying $742,000, Philadelphia $130,000, Boston $5,000, and San Francisco $18,000. The deficiencies in other cities were more than made up by these excesses, so that the surplus in round figures is $360,000. This service has not been extended to any new cities within the last three years, if I am correctly informed, and the number of letter-carriers in cities where the service existed before has not been increased. The committee recommend an increase in the appropriation for railway post-office clerks of $50,000, which makes the amount very much less than the estimate and very much less than what the Department think they can get along with. There are some increases of a minor character in three or four other items, which will be explained as we reach them in the course of the reading of the bill.

I ask that the five-minute rule be applied to this bill and that the amendments be acted upon as the reading of the bill is proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Senator from Arkansas asks that the five-minute rule be applied to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BECK. I do not object to the five-minute rule being applied to the bill and amendments of the Committee on Appropriations; but there are other important amendments to be proposed, as we have been advised, among others, for example, the Brazilian mail subsidy and another changing the whole system by a new bill from the Post-Office Committee, and I shall surely object to the five-minute rule applying to those amendments.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask that the five-minute rule be applied to the bill and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears no objection, and the five-minute rule will be applied to the bill and the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. The bill will now be read, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations acted on as they are reached in the reading.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was after the word "Revised Statutes," in line 17 of section 1, to insert "except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate;" so as to read:

Provided, That hereafter the per diem pay of all special agents appointed under section 4017, Revised Statutes, except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate, shall only be allowed when they are actually engaged in traveling on the business of the Department.

Mr. DORSEY. I have another amendment to offer here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will not the Senator let the amendment proposed by the committee be first adopted?

Mr. DORSEY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I now move further to amend that clause by inserting after the word "designate," in the amendment just adopted, the following:

And nine assistant superintendents of railway mail service as may be detailed to act as superintendents of division of railway mail service.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not properly come in there.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that the limitation that follows his amendment applies to the special agents; but after his amendment is inserted it will apply to these new appointments.

Mr. DORSEY. The appointments for special agents and for railway mail service are both made under the same section of the Revised Statutes, to wit, section 4017. These persons are first appointed special agents and then assigned to duty by order of the Postmaster-General as assistant superintendents of railway mail service, so that all come under the same head of "special agents."

Mr. INGALLS. Is it not the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas to designate nine additional superintendents of railway mail service or to limit their pay?

Mr. DORSEY. The purpose is to allow the Postmaster-General to detail nine special agents appointed under section 4017 of the Revised Statutes who shall act as assistant superintendents of railway mail service

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I supposed: but as inserted in the bill the result will be that their pay will be limited, and not that they will be designated for service.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator will turn back in the bill he will find that they will receive the $5 extra during the whole year by inserting the amendment here, while if they were not named here they would only receive the $5 a day while traveling.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment reported by the committee is "except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate." The following language limits the pay of those provided for in that amendment of the committee to the time that they are actually engaged in traveling on business of the Department. Now, I submit to the Senator that if he desires to provide in this bill that the Postmaster-General may designate nine additional superintendents of railway mail service, he should not put it in connection with that amendment. It does not belong there.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not understand why it does not belong there.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the amendment in this way: at present the law provides for a number of special post-office agents, and nine out of this number are designated as special railway mail superintendents. The intention of the amendment is that these nine men shall have $5 a day as traveling expenses, while the remainder not designated by this bill get $5 a day only when actually traveling. I understand that to be the substance of the amendment, and I think it comes in properly to cover the point.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from Kansas will look back he will see—

That hereafter the per diem pay of all special agents appointed, under section 4017, Revised Statutes, except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate.

And this adds the further exception of the nine which are detailed as superintendents of railway mail service. Those nineteen are excepted from the provisions of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps as the section of the Revised Statutes has not been read it might be as well to read it, so as to make it perfectly plain. The Postmaster-General by section 4017 is authorized to employ "such number of other special agents as the good of the service and the safety of the mail may require. Such agents shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of not more than $1,600 a year each, and shall each be allowed for traveling and incidental expenses, while actually employed in the service, a sum not exceeding $5 a day." The House has limited that by saying that the per diem "shall only be allowed when they are actually engaged in traveling on the business of the Department." We have excepted certain classes who may be located at very important points and not be traveling, and restored the section of the Revised Statutes as to them, allowing them pay while actually engaged in the service; and they are just as much engaged in the service while located at New York, Philadelphia, or other places where they have to pay about $5 a day, as they would be if they were traveling. It makes an exception of that class so necessarily located.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 26, section 1, to increase from $25,000 to $40,000 the appropriation "for preparation and publication of post-route maps."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 1, line 84, after the word "dollars," to insert "or imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, or punished by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court;" so as to read:

And any postmaster who shall make a false return to the Auditor, for the purpose of fraudulently increasing his compensation under the provisions of this or any other act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than $50 nor more than $500, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, or punished by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," in line 103, to strike out "and, further, shall be disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the United States;" so as to read:

And any postmaster, or other person connected with the postal service, who shall violate any of these provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that clause ought to be retained, but placed in a different position.

Mr. DORSEY. The Committee on Appropriations thought that the imposition of that disqualification on a person guilty was proposing a rather difficult and hard sentence, and there was also some doubt expressed as to whether the Congress of the United States had power to disqualify any person from holding an office under the United States for perpetrating a crime of that kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the words.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 105, to increase the appropriation "for compensation to clerks in post-offices," from $3,440,000 to $3,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in lines 107 and 108 of section 1, to increase the appropriation "for payment to letter-carriers" from $1,800,000 to $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 115, to increase the appropriation "for rent, light, and fuel," from $380,000 to $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 117, to increase the appropriation "for office furniture" from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 119, to increase the appropriation "for miscellaneous and incidental items" from $80,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to offer an amendment to come in just at the point where the Clerk is reading, at line 120.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be offered after the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are gone through.

Mr. WITHERS. I give notice that I desire to offer an amendment to the Senator's amendment when it shall be presented.

Mr. DORSEY. As soon as the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are acted on by the Senate, the Senator from Texas can propose his amendment to come in anywhere he likes.

Mr. MAXEY. I mentioned it now, because that seems to be the proper place for it to come in. But I will wait.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 127, to increase the appropriation "for transportation by railroad," from $9,100,000 to $9,635,000.

Mr. BECK. I should like to make a suggestion in regard to this amendment. If this amendment is adopted by the Senate, I want to know the effect of it, because the amendment that will be offered by the Senator from Texas, coming from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, is in direct conflict with this, and necessarily supersedes it. This cannot remain as a part of the bill, and the amendment which the Senator from Texas proposes to offer also be incorporated in it. If this amendment be inserted here, can it be afterward stricken out?

Mr. DORSEY. I am not aware of the character of the amendment the Senator from Texas is about to propose.

Mr. BECK. I find that I was mistaken in the amendment that the Senator from Texas intends to propose; but the committee were advised, and I supposed the Senator from Texas was going to offer it, that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will offer Senate bill No. 1142 regulating the transportation of mails on railroad routes, a bill of nine sections, altering and changing the whole system, and perhaps an improvement upon the present one, upon which we heard argument this morning, and upon which we desire to hear still further argument before the committee will be able to say whether this portion that is now in the bill sent from the House and amended by the committee of the Senate should remain, and I desire not to pass upon this clause of the bill in anticipation of what we know will be offered, and what the Post-Office Committee have assured us is a good improvement. Mr. Gardiner G. Hubbard, who has been on the special commission, has been insisting on it all the morning, and Mr. Vail, superintendent of the railway mail service also thinks it is an improvement. When the committee is considering it and expects to meet again to-morrow morning still further to consider it, I did not want anything done that would preclude it.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will explain the matter.

Mr. BECK. I ask the question whether this being inserted now will preclude us from striking it out and having the other amendment put in if it is found to be better? I misunderstood what the Senator from Texas was about to offer.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Kentucky is laboring under a misapprehension. The estimate of the Post-Office Department for the transportation of mail by railway is $10,145,000 as the laws now stand. That, it is represented, is the very closest estimate they can make, and the very least they can get along with. If, however, the manner of paying the railways is changed from weight to space, as they recommend, they say they can get along with $9,635,000, the exact amount which we have in this bill as amended. So that, if the Committee on Appropriations agree to the amendment suggested by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the Senate put that amendment upon this bill, the appropriation as recommended in this paragraph is just the amount we should be required to make to carry out the law. If, on the other hand, no change be made in the present manner of paying railways, this sum should be increased to $10,145,000.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment I was instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to offer is not an amendment to this clause as supposed by the Senator from Kentucky, but on a different subject. The members of the committee who have charge of that amendment will of course present it at the proper time. The one that I suggested I proposed to offer at the present time, but I am now told the proper time is after the Appropriation Committee's amendments have been acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As I understand the rules, it is altogether competent at any time before the passage of this bill to offer an amendment, to strike out the whole section if necessary and insert another. That is optional with the Senate entirely; so that at any time before the passage of the bill, when the bill is reported to the Senate, or after it is reported to the Senate, it is perfectly competent to amend the amendment now made, if it be adopted; and that being the case I take it the Senator from Kentucky agrees with the committee that if the present provision is to remain in the law this amount ought to be increased.

Mr. DORSEY. The difficulty which the Senator from Kentucky suggests can be readily avoided, and I ask——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that it would be better to go on and complete the bill as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and whatever amendment may be desired can be offered afterward.

Mr. DORSEY. Very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. This matter is very plain. Suppose amendments shall be offered subsequently in the Senate that will necessarily require an increased appropriation. Then when the bill comes from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate we shall adapt the sum to what the amendments shall require. If amendments shall be offered and not adopted, then the bill is all right as it stands.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask that a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on this subject be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But not read at present.

Mr. DORSEY. No. Let it be printed as an explanation.

The communication is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1878.

SIR: Referring to the provisions of House bill 4246, providing for the transportation of mails by railroad for the fiscal year of 1879, $9,100,000; and requiring a reduction of 5 per cent. in the rates of pay fixed for the weight of mails, I beg leave to submit the following statement for the consideration of your committee:

In the estimate of the cost of railroad service for 1879, presented in the annual report of the Postmaster-General, the cost for that year is set down at $10,140,126. The basis of that estimate is that the cost of the service on the 30th June, 1876, was $9,543,134. The actual reduction in the cost of the service, under the provisions of the act of July 12, 1876, was $935,547; and notwithstanding this deduction, the cost of the service on the 30th June, 1877, was $9,053,936, which is but $489,198 less than the cost of the service on the 30th June, 1877, leaving $446,302 as the amount attributable to the growth of the service for 1877.

From an actual statement of the monthly expenditures for railroad transportation, it is found that the $9,250,000 appropriated for the current year is at this time fully covered, and unavoidable obligations now resting upon the Department will carry the cost to over $9,400,000 as the figure with which to enter upon the new fiscal year, and this is aside from the readjustment to be made from July 1, 1878, on all railroad routes in the western section.

The readjustment for 1877 covered the New England section, where there is as little increase in the weight of mails as in any section of the country. The readjustment from July 1, 1878, will represent the section where there is the greatest development.

The number of miles of new service to be paid for in 1879 is at the present time nineteen hundred and sixty-nine. With this data, it is reasonable to conclude that the increased service for 1879 will reach 7 per cent. over the cost for 1878, which is the rate given in the estimates.

In a statement furnished the Committee on Appropriations of the House based on the cost of service to April 1, 1878, the estimate was made $10,045,637.05. Of this sum the present cost of railroad post-office service is $1,000,000; service under contract, $838,280.05, making the total sum exempt from any reduction $1,838,280.05; this deducted from the $10,045,637.05 leaves $8,207,357; this amount less the proposed abatement of 5 per cent. leaves $7,796,989.15; again adding the $1,838,280.05 makes the amount necessary to be appropriated, if the rates are reduced 5 per cent. as proposed by the House of Representatives, $9,635,269.20.

The amount proposed by the bill is $9,100,000.

Taking the current appropriation, $9,250,000, (the obligations of the Department are now considerably greater than that sum, and any other statement would be delusive,) as the basis for estimating the cost for 1879, on the plan proposed by the bill, would make the cost $8,879,414, which would leave for the expansion of the service $220,586.

Out of this, nineteen hundred and sixty-nine miles of new service are to be paid for for (say) one-half of 1878 and all of 1879; this will cost not less than $63,190.25 per annum, or for the period covered, $125,786.12; this would leave $94,799.28 to cover the increase from all other causes. That this sum, under the circumstances, is insufficient, cannot be doubted.

The railroad companies, especially those controlling the lines carrying light mails, which cover forty-eight thousand miles of road, have long complained that the requirements of the Department as to space, frequency of service, and the delivery of mails from stations to post-offices, are being constantly enlarged while the compensation has not been increased but diminished. It is conceded that in the main there is foundation for these complaints. If, therefore, the rates of pay are to be further reduced, the railroads should be relieved of the delivery of mails from stations to post-offices.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. W. DORSEY,
Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "actually," in line 140 of section 1, to strike out "traveling" and insert "employed," so as to read:

Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster-General may appoint one agent only to superintend the postal railway service, who shall be paid, out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail on railways, a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actually employed in the service not exceeding $5 per day.

Mr. KERNAN. "Incidental expenses, except while traveling," at $5 a day, with $2,500 a year, it seems is giving him about $1,500 more.

Mr. DORSEY. That is what it is, but we think he is worth it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then why do you not say so and put it into his compensation?

Mr. DORSEY. We do say so.

Mr. KERNAN. Why not call it $3,500 instead of $2,500, and not have these incidental expenses footed up at $5 a day?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The provision offered by the committee is just as the law is to-day and has been for some time. The salary will not be increased or decreased by adopting the committee's amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. The salary of this officer has always been $2,500 a year and $5 a day. It is true he is not traveling all the time, but he travels a great deal, and when he travels his expenses are much more than $5 a day. He is at the head of one of the most important bureaus of this Government and discharges his duties in a very able and commendable manner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is rather an underground way of paying a high salary, it strikes me.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator it is just as the Revised Statutes now do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not the less underground if it is. Here you propose in an appropriation bill, as it is called in its title, but which when you read it through appears to be a general bill for the regulation of the Post-Office Department with incidental appropriations, a provision for the employment of an agent or superintendent of the postal railway service at a salary of $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actually employed.

as the committee propose to say, in the service. If he has a salary, he is employed in the service all the time. There are three hundred and sixty-five days then to be added at $5 a day. Is not that it?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is right.

Mr. DORSEY. Does the Senator from Vermont think that too much?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point I am on just now. I am thinking about what the Heathen Chinee said "the tricks that are vain," to have a salary of $2,500 a year and an absolute horizontal $5 a day for the whole three hundred and sixty-five days in the year under the pretense that it is "incidental expenses."

Now, Mr. President, the best feature in legislation is honesty, and candor, and plain speech. If this gentleman ought to have $1,900 a year, in round numbers, added to his $2,500, making $4,400, then why did not the committee make this bill say so?

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to wait a moment?

Mr. DORSEY. I want to answer that question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not just now, if you please.

Why did not the committee say so and make his salary $4,500 a year instead of obfuscating the thing, to use a western phrase, or to use a New England phrase I will say to make it perfectly safe, by declaring that his salary is $2,500 a year—all the people can see that we have low salaries, and they do not see that this other clause means that he is to have $1,900 a year more, that is just as certain and just as fixed as his salary is. If that is a good way to legislate, then I shall be glad to have my friend from Arkansas say so, for which I now yield the floor.

Mr. DORSEY. The reason the Committee on Appropriations did not say that this officer should receive $4,400 a year is because the Revised Statutes, under a law which has been in existence since the railway postal service was organized, say that this officer shall get $2,500 a year and $5 a day, and the Committee on Appropriations are not in the habit of changing the Revised Statutes when they can help it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have missed their habit badly, then, in this bill, I am very sure, for they have changed the law a good deal. Now what does the Senator say the section is?

Mr. DORSEY. Four thousand and twenty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Section 4020 is:

> The Postmaster-General may appoint two agents to superintend the railway postal service.

So far the Revised Statutes say one thing and this bill says another. It says he may appoint one.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator that is a reduction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it is, but it is a change of the Revised Statutes which seemed to be the sacred thing the committee cannot touch!

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But the Senator will recollect probably that it was changed not in this bill, but in some former bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not recollect anything about that. I take the bill just as it is.

> Each of whom shall be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actively employed in the service.

The committee has seen fit to drop "actively employed" and to say simply "employed," the Revised Statutes intending that this "actively employed" shall mean when he is traveling away from home and is incurring expense different from the expense he would incur in his normal condition of sitting in his office in the capital and attending to his affairs. There is change number two in the Revised Statutes that are so very sacred to the committee.

> Of not more than $5 a day.

The difference between the existing state of the law and this is that the Revised Statutes provide that he shall have a salary of $2,500 a year, and traveling and incidental expenses not exceeding $5 a day when he is actively employed in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. KERNAN. That is the way the House passed the bill, using the words "incidental expenses while traveling," and not at other times.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not complaining of what the House has done, for the House has put the correct construction upon this provision in the Revised Statutes which was intended to mean and which fairly understood does mean, and nothing more, that when this gentleman is put to extraordinary expense out of his ordinary course, he shall have not exceeding $5 a day for the necessary incidental disbursements, and so forth, that he is obliged to make. Now the Senate committee proposes that whenever he is actually employed in the service, which is all the time, Sundays included, he shall have $5 a day; in other words, that his salary shall be increased from $2,500 a year to $4,500; that is what it comes to in round numbers. It may be that this officer ought to have a salary of $4,500 a year; and if he ought, then the committee ought to put the language of this statute in such terms that it is a salary, and if it be a salary then it ought to be understood that he pays his own expenses whenever he travels. But the committee appears to have gone around the thing in both ways, providing, not as the law now is, and not as the House bill did, that this addition to his compensation should be a limited remuneration for what he actually paid out in the performance of his duties, the $2,500 a year being his pay, but that he should really have $2,000 a year in round numbers, more than he gets now. If that be right, it ought to be stated in the honest and plain way, that his salary shall be $4,500 a year and he shall have no allowance for traveling expenses.

Mr. INGALLS. It does not cost these officers anything to travel. They are always furnished with free transportation over all mail routes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Hotel bills they would have to pay, and for their morning newspaper, and their bootblack, and the various other little things they have to submit to.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say one word in connection with the action of the committee on this subject. If there are any "tricks that are vain," as the Senator from Vermont intimates, connected with the matter, certainly the present Committee on Appropriations are not responsible for them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. I do not think they are.

Mr. WITHERS. The phraseology of the Revised Statutes has been followed in this case precisely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh no, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DORSEY. We left out the word "actively." Otherwise it is precisely the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me read to the Senator from Virginia, to correct a mistake into which I think he has fallen, the language of the Revised Statutes:

> A salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, while actively employed in the service, of not more than $5 a day.

Now this bill reads:

> With an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actually traveling in the service.

That is the House bill, but here:

> While actually employed in the service.

So the Senate will see that the language is not the same and that the committee has not followed the statute.

Mr. WITHERS. One is "actually" and the other "actively;" that is the difference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. WITHERS. I am not speaking of the distinction of the House bill, but on the language of the Revised Statutes; one is "actively" and the other "actually." Now, while I concur fully with the views of the Senator from Vermont as to the proper construction of the language of the Revised Statutes, I would say that this change was made because the construction actually put upon the section in practice has been different, and all these special agents have been receiving not only the amount of their salaries, but $5 a day the year round, whether they traveled one mile or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then there was a violation of the law.

Mr. WITHERS. And the House, in order to correct that evil, restricted the $5 per diem in their bill to the days when they were actually traveling, and I must acknowledge that my prepossessions were in favor of the House bill until upon examination I found that some of the most important agents of the Post-Office Department, some of the most valuable men in the service, would be compelled to quit it, because under the practical operation of the law as amended by the House bill they would only receive $2,500 a year, when their services would command a very much larger salary in almost any other business, and it was deemed improper to restrict such valuable agents to the sum of $2,500, and therefore the committee made an exception in nine cases, to be designated by the Postmaster-General, where the services of such agents were needed at the most important points throughout the country. Then when we came to this particular officer, if the House bill had been followed we knew that his services could not be retained, the Postmaster-General had been before the committee in person and also by written communication and urged the great importance to the Government of retaining the services of the present superintendent of the railway mail service, and insisted that his salary should be made adequate to the position and duties which he filled. The committee therefore fell back upon the language of the statutes with the qualification which I have mentioned of substituting "actually" for "actively," and provided this salary by this indirect mode, as the Senator very correctly says.

Now it is essentially necessary, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, that the services of this officer should be retained as being of exceeding value to the whole country; and if the Senator desires to amend by prescribing a salary of $4,500 per annum and striking out the latter portion, individually I have no objection to it in the world; but I wanted to explain the reasons which influenced the committee in readopting the language which has been used in successive appropriation bills for many years, as I am informed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope no Senator supposes that I was criticising the conduct or the motives or the purposes of the committee. I was only expressing my criticism upon the bill as presented which appears, as it is frankly stated by the Senator from Virginia, to provide in an indirect and a kind of covered-up way for a greater salary than $2,500 a year. It is salary and nothing else that this general superintendent is to have, because probably ten months in the year he sits in his office in Washington and has no more expense to incur than any other officer here has.

It is not in order for me to move (which I should be glad to do and will if there is unanimous consent for it) to put the salary up to $3,500 a year and strike out the provision for traveling and incidental expenses, so that he stands just like any other bureau officer in Wash ington, as this particular person is; and I will make that motion, and if there is no objection, of course the Chair can put it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont that the gentleman discharging this particular service appeared before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and I am bound to say that a very large proportion of his time is employed in traveling from point to point arranging mail service on the railroads of the country.

Mr. WITHERS. That is true.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know from the expression of views on the subject that there is perhaps no man in the country so well qualified as he is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very dangerous to pass laws upon the particular merits of particular men. This gentleman, if he is very worthy and efficient, has not any permanent lease of office. I do not mean by that that he is likely to be turned out for that reason; but even the best of men may die and inferior men may take their places. If the duties of this office require a person who ought to receive more than $2,500 a year as pay, as distinguished from the expenses that he is obliged to incur, then let us increase the salary and then pay only the actual expense that this officer is obliged to incur when he travels in the performance of his duty. That is the right way of doing it, I respectfully submit to the Senate and to the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only interposed a remark because I understood the Senator from Vermont supposed the superintendent in charge of this railroad service was in Washington about ten months in the year, whereas according to my impression from what he stated he was absent perhaps ten months out of the twelve.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I accept the correction with great pleasure, assuming it to be correct.

Mr. WITHERS. That is the statement of the Postmaster-General, too, that he is absent ten months in the year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being so, I think it would be much better to stick to the House bill and pay this extra allowance for what it is really intended to be by the law as it now stands, and that is for the disbursements that this officer is obliged to incur in the performance of his duty. That is what the Revised Statutes mean, fairly construed; that is what the House bill is; and then if his salary is not high enough at that, if he ought to have more besides the disbursements that he is obliged to submit to, then strike out "twenty-five hundred" and make it $3,000 or $3,500 or whatever the committee choose; but do not let us in this indirect and obscure way undertake to increase a salary under the profession that we are paying disbursements.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Vermont alludes to this language as changed by the Committee on Appropriations as if it was something entirely new. He refers to this case as being a roundabout way of giving a man a salary, and as an entirely fresh thing. Now, the truth is that since we have had special agents of the Post-Office Department, which I presume is thirty or forty years—certainly ever since I have known anything about the Department—they have been paid this way. But since this officer has exercised the duties of his office, and while his predecessor was in office who organized the office, they have both been paid in the identical way provided in this bill. And unless the Revised Statutes are changed by this appropriation bill in toto he cannot be paid any other way.

Now, as to the word the Appropriation Committee has used, "actually" instead of "actively," it conforms precisely with the statute. That, however, is a matter of no consequence. I would just as soon that "actively" should be used there as the word that is used.

I have a letter from the Postmaster-General on this subject, which I desire the Clerk to read that his views may be laid before the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1878.

SIR: In accordance with the request of your letter of the 2d instant I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of your committee, the statements desired from the officers of this Department in regard to the increase considered expedient by them in the appropriations for their respective bureaus, as follows:

A, letter of topographer.

A', extracts from topographer's report to the Postmaster-General, showing the work of the bureau.

B, letter of the acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

C, letter of the superintendent of the free-delivery service.

D, letter of the superintendent of the railway mail service.

These statements will, I think, supply all the information desired by your committee, and the recommendations of the bureau officers are cordially indorsed by me.

I desire to call attention to the injustice which will be done to the special agents and superintendents of railway mail service by limiting their per diem to the time actually spent in traveling without increasing their salary. The salary of most of these officers is fixed at $1,200, and their per diem is now paid for each day they are actually engaged in the business of the Department, whether traveling or not. No allowance outside of the per diem is made for expenses, which often greatly exceed the per diem, and if the per diem is only paid when the officer is actually traveling on the business of the Department he will often be compelled to draw upon his salary to pay the expenses necessarily incurred in excess of the per diem.

The compensation of the special agents cannot be deemed excessive in view of their difficult and often dangerous duties. Persons capable of discharging the duties assigned to special agents and to superintendents of railway mail service receive higher salaries from private corporations than do these officers of the Department. The American Express Company, with less than twenty thousand miles of route, employs three superintendents and assistant superintendents to one employed in the railway mail service, with nearly eighty thousand miles of route. The Post-Office Department does quite as much transportation in bulk and infinitely more in pieces than the express companies do. The express companies pay their assistant superintendent from $3,500 to $5,000 per annum and all expenses.

The Post-Office Committee of the House of Representatives, at the suggestion of the Department, proposed to make the salary of the chief special agent the same as that of the general superintendent of railway mail service, but the amendment was ruled out under the point of order.

I would recommend that the bill be so amended and that the salary of these two officers be fixed at $2,500, with per diem, as now, when actually engaged in the business of the Department. Officers of other Departments in analogous positions, with less responsibility and lighter duties, receive greater pay. The duties of the general superintendent of railway mail service are similar to those of the general superintendent of an express company and, in some respects, more difficult. An officer capable of discharging these duties efficiently receives from these private corporations a salary of from $10,000 to $15,000, and all expenses.

To limit the per diem of these officers and of the special agents and assistant superintendents of railway mail service to the time when they are actually traveling would reduce the compensation of many of them when they are really most industriously engaged.

I am not prepared to say that the present system of compensating the special agents and superintendents of railway mail service is the best that can be devised. If, as has been intimated, it should hereafter be the pleasure of Congress to consider a bill to reorganize the Post-Office Department, it may be that a better system of classifying and grading the pay of these officers can be devised, but so long as the present system is maintained it would be an injustice to some of the most deserving of them to limit the per diem, as proposed by the House bill.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. W. DORSEY,
United States Senate.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say a word relative to the action of the committee. The Senator from Vermont must recollect that one desirable object is not to change existing laws in appropriation bills. We have done it very often, but always badly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is why I oppose this clause.

Mr. BECK. I want to explain that. We found fifty-three special agents employed under section 4017 of the Revised Statutes, and the language used was that they should have a salary not exceeding $1,600 a year "and shall each be allowed traveling and incidental expenses, while actually employed"—not actively—"in the service not exceeding $5 a day;" and the Committee on Appropriations, thinking they had a right to cut down as much as they could, deprived all the fifty-three of that class of agents of that right except nineteen, and they were excepted from it because they were located at large cities, frequently had to remain at the same point for a good while to arrange the business, and were as much under expense as if they were traveling, because ordinarily while traveling those agents have free passage right along, and it is a good deal cheaper for them to travel than to live at a large hotel in New York. Of those men so located nineteen were reserved from the operation of the cutting off of the per diem.

When we came to Mr. Vail, as the Postmaster-General had the right to appoint two and the House had limited him to one superintendent, we agreed to limit him to one at $2,500, and $5 a day while actually employed. The language of the Revised Statutes, as we now see, is "while actively employed." I confess I did not observe the difference between "actually," as used in section 4017, and "actively," as used in section 4020, and I shall move to strike out the word "actually" and insert the word "actively," so as to comply literally with the Revised Statutes. Then, if there is anything wrong in the administration of the law we can change it by a subsequent law; but as long as the Revised Statutes made that provision the intention of the committee, at least my intention was, to comply exactly with them, and having seen the words "actually employed" in section 4017 I did not look to the other section to see the change; and finding the word "traveling" in the House bill we struck it out and put in the word "employed," without observing that the word "actively" was used in section 4020, and not "actually." I shall endeavor to make it conform precisely to the statute by using the words "actively employed in the service," and then let the construction follow, whatever it may be.

I believe in striking down all supernumerary officers, and perhaps we could do very well with one superintendent; but that superintendent has to be a man of very decided ability. I do not care whether he is the present one or not, he has to deal with great railroad corporations; he has to act upon matters involving thousands and sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars. He has all the arrangement of the mail service on the great railroads of the country under his control; and, though I never saw Mr. Vail I believe until within the last year, I have had one or two conversations with him on business transactions and I am satisfied that he is certainly a man who ought to have a fair salary, and that the Government is quite fortunate in having a man of his ability and general information at the head of this department. I would have no hesitation, as the Senator from Virginia said, in giving him a salary much larger than $2,500, rather than lose him, but I want the law to remain just as it is, and if the salary is to be changed let it be changed directly. I move to strike out "actually," in line 140, and insert "actively."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky on the subject of the propriety of increasing this gentleman's compensation, of course have great weight; but my point is that if the compensation is to be increased it ought to be increased plainly as an increase of compensation that a worthy public servant justly deserves. That is the way to do it. Now the Senator says that the difficulty about that was that the committee wanted to follow the law in an appropriation bill. That is a very good point, and one from which I very rarely have departed, and I hope never hereafter shall depart. But the House itself has changed the law in this appropriation bill on this very point of the superintendent of the postal railway service. The law provides for two, and duly construed it provides for a salary of $2,500 a year and for the actual disbursements of these people while engaged in going about the country to perform their duties. That is the fair meaning of it.

Mr. BECK. The law does not provide for two, but says the Postmaster-General may appoint two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and this says that the Postmaster-General may appoint only one, and it amounts to a prohibition against his appointing two. So the House of Representatives in its bill, and the Senate Committee on Appropriations, have both chosen to change the law in respect of these superintendents of postal railway service. If, then, they are willing to change the law, where is the difficulty in their changing it so as to give these people proper compensation as compensation and proper expenses for disbursements as disbursements while they are traveling about the country? That is what the House undertook to do. The House evidently was of opin on that $2,500 a year, with the actual disbursements for traveling expenses and the expenses incident to traveling, was enough. Senators of the committee seem to think that it is not. Then the committee, I respectfully submit, ought to have proposed, as we are changing the law about that business, to have increased the salary, and still to have put this limit upon the disbursing expenses just where the House left it, the actual traveling disbursements. That is the sensible way to do it, as it appears to me. I may be wrong; but I am opposed on all appropriation bills, as I stated a few days ago about the pension bill, to changing the law at all. An appropriation bill ought to be merely the furnishing of the money to carry out existing laws; and if this bill were an original bill in the Senate, we have a rule that would prohibit the committee, and prohibit the Senate without unanimous consent, from changing any part of the system, great or small, but merely providing for the appropriation of the money necessary to carry out the law as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee. The Senator from Vermont indicated an amendment some time since. Does the Senator withdraw the amendment? It could only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I conclude that as the thing stands I will not propose the amendment, but leave the committee to do it if their own amendment should not be agreed to, because I do not wish to change the existing law about any thing in an appropriation bill.

Mr. DORSEY. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the committee's amendment be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us try it on the committee's amendment first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out "traveling" and insert "employed."

Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator who has charge of this bill what difference in the compensation there is between the amount allowed by the committee's amendment and the amount which would be allowed by the House bill?

Mr. DORSEY. The difference would be $5 a day while he was not absent traveling. That probably is six or seven months in the year. The difference might be $1,000 a year.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then there would be that added to the $2,500, which would make about $4,000 a year.

Mr. DORSEY. No, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. That would be the salary allowed.

Mr. DORSEY. The total salary under this bill would be about $4,500 a year, supposing this gentlemen to get $5 for every day in the year. If the House provision is agreed to he would only get the $5 a day when he was actually absent from his post here traveling, which would be two or three months in the year.

Mr. McMILLAN. How do the duties of this office compare with the duties of the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs or of Commissioner of the General Land Office and of the different Auditors in the Treasury Department?

Mr. DORSEY. I think the place much more important than either one of them and much more difficult.

Mr. SARGENT. This officer really has the supervision of the expenditure of the whole $9,000,000 mentioned in this paragraph, and obviously is a very important officer, who has necessarily to keep the details of all postal service on the railways throughout the United States, eighty thousand miles. It requires, and I have no doubt we now have, a man of great discrimination and executive ability. Certainly the office requires that; and the amount which is now paid to this officer, for the services of a man who can peform all these varied and responsible duties properly, is not too great.

I do not understand that the Senator from Vermont objects that the amount paid by law now to this man is too great. He prefers, however, that it shall be by way of salary, and then if there is anything by way of expenses those should be ascertained for each day that he travels, rather than that the party should be made up in that manner. If this were an original bill I should agree with him entirely. It seems to me it would have been very much better for Congress originally to have made the proposition in that form; but the Committee on Appropriations endeavor as far as possible to follow the existing statutes, and wherever we find in an appropriation bill that they are departed from we conceive that it is not our duty; we make the bill, if we can, conform with the existing laws.

This is only another method, perhaps an indirect method, of ascertaining what the salary of this person shall be. The amount, of course, is directly ascertained by saying he shall have $2,500 a year and that he shall have $5 a day additional, which shall be taken to compensate him for the time he is actually traveling. As a matter of fact the $5 a day will not compensate him for the time he is actually traveling, because it is often the case that his expenses will exceed that, as the Postmaster-General says, and he therefore draws on his salary for the rest of the time. Five dollars a day will not pay the expenses of the Senator from Vermont in going to New York and spending five or six days and returning to Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But unhappily I have to pay railroad fare, and the post-office agent does not.

Mr. SARGENT. This man has to pay the Pullman-car fare. That is invariable, I believe; nobody is allowed to dead-head on that, because it has nothing to do with the railway mail service; and that itself is a serious charge. Out in my country it is $3 a day, and a man's meals would soon run it up to over $5 a day. But a man cannot stay in New York at a decent hotel and pay his expenses there out of $5 a day; so that to a certain extent, greater or less, the amount of his annual salary is trenched upon even if you allow him $5 a day.

I do not think that $4,000 a year is too much for the man who discharges this duty, as the Postmaster-General says and says most earnestly. Express companies which employ persons for similar service but with less responsibility, with less miles of road to take care of, pay very much greater salaries—from $3,500 to $5,000 besides all expenses of travel. We pay very much less than those persons. Of course they are presumed to act, having only selfishness and their own interests to guide them, by the best principles of business; hence they bring to bear upon it the best judgment which business men can upon such propositions, and they find that their interests are subserved by paying a decent price for good service. Now, suppose the pay is reduced, so that a man holding this place can only get $2,500, the result would be that this man, like Mr. Bangs, probably would leave the service, and we should lose a valuable agent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Bangs left long ago.

Mr. SARGENT. Simply because he did not get enough. We lose the services of men in these responsible places because we do not pay enough for them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then why does not the committee propose to make the salary sufficient, and pay in addition the actual disbursements in traveling?

Mr. SARGENT. I said that I thought as an original proposition that would be better. I agree with the Senator entirely in his logic, but I have felt as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, by long practice and habit, a prejudice in favor of reporting the money in the bills to correspond with existing law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right, but in this very case the House has changed the law about this very officer.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably the House has reduced one agent. They have not changed the law by their proposition of amendment. That does not change any law. The only instance in which I consent to their change is where they abolish an office; and there I am disposed to believe that the office can be got along without. I think it was created under peculiar circumstances and that there was no necessity for it, and my judgment must concur with my prejudice in favor of keeping the law as it is if the law is in some sense a beneficial law. This is beneficial in that it gives a man the pay he ought to have, and therefore I do not see for that reason why we should invade the real province of the Committee on Appropriations by recommending changes in the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we do not if we take a change in the law on this very subject that is presented to us by the House. They say on this very point, "Let us reduce these agents to one, and let us pay that agent $2,500 a year and his actual traveling expenses." That is what it means. Now, the committee say, "We will submit to this change in the law, because we think it is good, but we will not make a corresponding change in the very same law that we do think is good by putting up this salary where it ought to be, and paying the disbursements measured by what is actually paid."

Mr. SARGENT. In exactly the same manner I should like to say to my friend that I will agree that the number of the fourth-class clerks, or the number of the third-class clerks, or the number of the first-class clerks shall be reduced, if the service will spare the reduction; but I will not agree on an appropriation that first-class clerks who receive $1,200 shall be reduced to a thousand dollars, and I will not agree that fourth-class clerks shall be reduced in salary. In other words, I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations, as it is constituted, has time to attend to such matters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good.

Mr. SARGENT. This is upon exactly the same principle. The House believed that we could get along without one officer, and therefore ab lished his office. I would not agree to reduce the number of twelve-hundred-dollar clerks if I thought we could not spare the number; but I do not think that fixing the compensation of men involves the principle of changing the law. We may drop officers from the bill who are merely discretionary, like clerks; sometimes we do where they are not discretionary, as where they are fixed in the organic law, as in the Land Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And as in this very bill.

Mr. SARGENT. But we have had the valuable service of my friend from Vermont over and over again in resisting the proposition to change salaries upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I do, and yet what the Senator says about agreeing to drop a superintendent of the postal railway service involves the entire proposition of changing the whole law. Take the Army or the Navy for illustration. That is no more fixed by law than these two postal railway superintendents are; not a bit.

Mr. SARGENT. I should think it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not, Mr. President. The Revised Statutes say that there is authority to employ two of these men. This appropriation bill says there shall be authority to employ only one. The Revised Statutes of the United States say that the Army shall consist of so many regiments and so many men.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; "shall."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The appropriation bill says it shall not consist of so many. You therefore violate the very law just as much in the one case as in the other, as far as I can understand it.

But coming back to this very point, the House bill, while it does change the law as to the number, carries out the law as to the allowance. The law as it now stands justly construed, in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of every lawyer and judge is that the postal agent is to have not exceeding $5 a day for his actual incidental disbursements and incidental expenses. It is not when he is not at an expense; it is when he is traveling and is obliged to disburse money to pay for his going about the country. That is the practical meaning of the Revised Statutes. The House of Representatives have made that clear, because they say there is an abuse, the law is not construed now so, and they bring it up to light. The Senate committee say, because this man ought to have more money, (grant that he ought to have it,) they will give it to him in the form of having a constructive disbursement under the head of incidental expenses while actually employed in his duties, which is all the time. I respectfully submit to the committee that inasmuch as they are changing the true theory and tenor of the law, both the House and the committee, to take the necessary step of putting this salary up to where it ought to be and confine the disbursements to what they actually are.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. DORSEY. Will the Senator from California allow me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. I believe the Senator from Vermont has been talking in my time, and I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DORSEY. If it is true, as the Senator from Vermont says, that the Revised Statutes simply mean that these men shall receive $5 a day compensation when they are actually traveling and at no other time, I should be glad to inquire what has become of the money that has been paid these men for their services every day in the year for the last eight or ten years?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an abuse of the law, and the man guilty of that sort of abuse ought to be dealt with by some committee existing at some end of the Capitol.

Mr. DORSEY. The First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General are the disbursing officers upon my theory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The First Comptroller of the Treasury has nothing to do with it. It is a rare circumstance to which attention ought to be called that in respect to postal disbursements no body but the Sixth Auditor, practically a postal agent himself, has any charge of the settlement of the accounts. The Post-Office Department settles its own accounts. That is the amount of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the salary of this officer is to be increased, I think with the Senator from Vermont, that it should be done by language which would indicate directly the intention to increase it. I am not very familiar with the duties to be performed by this officer, but the amount allowed under the committee's amendment will be a larger sum than the amount appropriated for the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which it seems to me is an office of as great responsibility, and the duties of which are as onerous as the duties of the superintendent of the railway mail service. If this increase is to be made let it be made directly. If the salary is to be increased, we should know what it is and pay it as we pay other officers of the Government.

Mr. WITHERS. This is no increase of salary.

Mr. DORSEY. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that there is no increase proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an increase of pay, whatever you may call it.

Mr. DORSEY. It is the salary that the officer in this place has received ever since the office was established. I will say furthermore, while I am up, that when we shall come to fix the pay or salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I will be ready to act with my friend from Minnesota. But the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is not now under consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Arkansas will allow me to interrupt him, I understood him to say, in answer to a question put to him by myself, that the difference between the amount allowed by the House bill and the amount which would be allowed under the amendment of the Senate committee would be about $1,500.

Mr. DORSEY. No, sir, I did not say that. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should be glad to hear what the Senator did say.

Mr. DORSEY. I said that under the House bill this officer could only receive $5 a day while he was absent from the city of Washington traveling, and that while here at his post performing the duties of his office he would receive only $2,500 a year. Probably during the year he is absent two or three months, and for those two or three months he would receive $5 a day, when he would expend in that time $8 or $10 a day. That is what I said.

Mr. WINDOM. I have usually the utmost confidence in the reports of the Committee on Appropriations. In this case, however, I do not agree with them, and I feel at perfect liberty to oppose the amendment, because I gave notice to the committee when the action was taken that I should not vote for this proposition. I am opposed to the amendment of the committee for several reasons. In the first place, I think that it makes a compensation that does not correspond with that paid to other officers, and, in the second place, if the compensation be not larger than it should be, it is not made in the proper way, but should be made directly, so that every one would understand precisely what the language means.

Upon the first of these points, I want to ask the attention of the Senate for a single moment to the disparity in the payment of this officer and of his superior officers in the Post-Office Department itself. The First Assistant Postmaster-General is paid $3,500 per annum; the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500, and the third assistant receives the same compensation.

Mr. SARGENT. Do they have any traveling expenses of any kind?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that they do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no provision by law for it.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no provision by law for it, and no necessity for it. Five dollars a day at any rate is supposed to pay traveling expenses. A large part of this man's time is spent in traveling, to my positive knowledge. He only gets $2,500 a year, which is a thousand dollars less than the officers mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. But, so far as the actual compensation paid is concerned, the Senator from Arkansas tells us that this amendment gives him in all about $4,500 per annum. I think he overstates it a few hundred dollars. I think it is about $4,250.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is the gross sum, the salary and allowances for traveling?

Mr. WINDOM. That is the whole sum. Four thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars, I believe, is the exact sum, allowing $5 a day for three hundred and sixty-five days, Sundays included. I understand that under the law as it now exists the compensation is estimated at $5 a day for three hundred and sixty-five days. The officer is supposed to be actually employed in the service Sundays and every other day. I do not think that a proper relation in salaries is maintained. My colleague has referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who is paid $3,000 a year. He has responsibilities greater than this man by far. You cannot estimate the responsibility by the sum that is expended for the service. If you would do that some of the officers of the Treasury, for instance the Treasurer himself, through whose hands billions of money pass, would certainly have a responsibility that would be incalculable. It is true there are about $9,000,000 appropriated for this service, but the officer whose pay is under consideration has very little to do with the application of that vast fund to the service.

Mr. PADDOCK. Of course it is well enough known to every one that the superintendent of the railway mail service has a great deal of traveling to do. I should like to inquire of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, if it is not true that whenever the Commissioner of Indian Affairs goes anywhere upon business connected with his bureau his expenses are paid?

Mr. WINDOM. His expenses may be paid out of the incidental appropriations for the Department. Possibly his expenses are paid when he travels.

Mr. PADDOCK. There is no question about it at all.

Mr. WINDOM. I presume that is the fact.

Mr. PADDOCK. The expenses of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are always paid. If he goes to New York upon business connected with his office, his expenses are paid. If the gross sum of those expenses should be added to his salary, I think my friend would discover that his salary would amount to a great deal more than that of the officer in question.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has no occasion to travel to an extent that would make it anything near so much as the salary we propose to pay here.

Mr. PADDOCK. The duties of course are not analogous.

Mr. WINDOM. How much travel may be necessary in this case, I do not know. I am entirely willing to agree to the House proposition which pays this officer for all the traveling that he is required to do. He does not pay his own expenses. He travels free upon every train; I do not know whether upon the Pullman sleeping-car or not, but certainly upon every train throughout the country. Just look for a moment at the law to which this construction is given:

The Postmaster-General may appoint two agents to superintend the railway postal service, each of whom shall be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail, a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, with an allowance—

For what? For staying at home? For Sundays? No, sir—

With an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, while actually employed in the service, of not more than $5 a day.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that the construction of the present law is very clear upon that subject. It was not designed to pay this officer for the time that he remains at home. The $5 a day are for traveling expenses, for incidental expenses when traveling. I believe, as the Senator from Vermont has said, that the construction which has been given to this law is an abuse of the law itself. Now, I do not propose to make that abuse permanent by incorporating it in the statute which we are about to pass.

Mr. PADDOCK. My friend does not consider the allowance of $5 a day extravagant.

Mr. WINDOM. Not for traveling. I believe an allowance of $5 per day while traveling, when the railway transportation costs nothing, is a full compensation. That was what the law originally designed. The House proposition simply gives the construction which was designed to be given to it, as I believe, when the law was made. Under the House proposition this officer would get $2,500 per annum, and $5 per day for every day actually employed in traveling. Under the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations he would get $2,500 a year and $5 per day for incidental expenses and traveling expenses for every day he stays at home. I do not believe that is the right principle.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the chairman of the committee whether that has not been the construction of the Post-Office Department in regard to the special agents since they have been in service?

Mr. WINDOM. I understand that it is the construction, but I think it is an erroneous construction.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We have year after year followed along in the same track, and there is no reason why we should make an exception of this one man. We have already provided in the bill for twenty-odd of them.

Mr. BECK. Nineteen.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, nineteen. I thought it was twenty-odd. Previously this has been done each year. Now, here is a man singled out, and he is to be made an exception. I do not think it is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from West Virginia I think is mistaken——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend, probably he did not intend it, but this morning he sat me down very unceremoniously indeed, as I thought. I suppose he did not intend to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only rose to correct the palpable mistake into which the Senator has fallen about his own bill; but I shall take my time for it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought I was going to correct the Senator this morning when he would not hear me. But I will listen to the Senator from Vermont with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I will have mercy upon the Senator from West Virginia and say that he is entirely mistaken in this respect. There are fifty-three special agents who are expected to receive their pay under the same provision that the Senate proposes to give to this officer. But we have changed that as to all the fifty-three except ten, whom we authorize to be located at certain places, and nine other officers who have been added by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are forty-three of these men whose compensation has been changed because of the apparent abuse of paying men for traveling and incidental expenses when they were staying at home, which was certainly never intended to be done. I only ask that the same rule shall be applied to this officer that we have applied to the forty-three other special agents.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no particular interest in this officer. I know him, but that is about all. I have heard that he is a very efficient officer. I would not state what the Postmaster-General said in committee, but he said to me individually that he was a very valuable man, and he did not know what would become of the service but for him; that he had to arrange and control nearly the entire nine millions of money appropriated for this service; that the railroads all through the country came in contact with him, and that he was a man among all in the Department whose services were most valuable.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. My friend from West Virginia says that this officer has control of nine millions of money.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. WINDOM. Is he not a little mistaken?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I can hardly say that the Postmaster-General meant to say he had control of it. I meant to say that a considerable portion of it was under his control.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to get at the exact fact, if the Senator will allow me, as to the extent of this control. A very large proportion of this amount, I do not know what percentage, about 80 or 90 per cent. of it, is paid to the railroads and other transportation companies under contracts for carrying the mails under the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Under the law, of course.

Mr. WINDOM. Under the law and under contracts which these people make.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no such thing, I understand, as a contract with a railroad company.

Mr. WINDOM. All the railroads of the country carry the mails—a law tantamount to a contract, I understand.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Under the construction of the law this man gives direction as to where the mails shall go. The whole railway service is under his supervision. He goes to New York or Boston, whence there are three or four roads running to the West, and the superintendent has the direction to a great extent as to what line and what time and what train the mails shall be carried on, and he comes in contact with all the railroad superintendents for the purpose of making special arrangements for carrying the mails.

Mr. WINDOM. Undoubtedly he has much to do with giving direction as to where the mails shall go, but he has nothing to do with fixing the compensation. The law fixes the compensation at so much per pound or so much per hundred pounds on each of the roads where the mail is carried. He has really very little discretion as to the use of this large amount of money. To say that there are nine millions of money expended by his office does not measure his responsibility in the slightest degree. I admit it is an important office, but then its importance is not to be measured by the $9,000,000 of money expended in this service by any manner of means. If the salary is not high enough, let us make it higher; let us fix on some amount and not have any of this constructive pay. We have long ago got over the idea of constructive pay in this country. I think we should fix the salary at a given sum. If it is not enough, I will vote for $3,500 freely; but I cannot vote for the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I always like to understand exactly how matters stand. The law as it now stands provides for two officers at a certain rate. Each one of them is to have $2,500 per annum and an allowance for expenses. The proposition as it comes to us from the House is to dispense with one of these officers, imposing upon the other the entire duty now performed by the two, as I suppose, and then, instead of increasing his pay in proportion to the increased amount of labor imposed upon him, the second proposition is to materially decrease his pay. That seems to me to be hardly fair. If heretofore we have provided for two officers, giving each one of them a certain sum of money, and now we abolish one of these officers and impose the duties of both upon one, it seems to me hardly fair to impose upon him double the labor and decrease the pay he formerly got for doing half the labor.

Mr. WINDOM. I think upon that point the Senator will find upon investigation that the House discovered a little abuse in connection with this thing, and they endeavored to correct it, and we want to help them.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understood that perfectly well. In other words, if I understand it, we had two officers and each was receiving $4,325 a year. We now dispense with one of them entirely and instead of leaving to the other one $4,325, when he has the whole work of the two to perform, we propose not only to add to his labor the labor performed by the other man, but to decrease his salary below what he formerly received for doing half the work. That strikes me as hardly fair. The duties of this office are exceedingly important, as I understand. We are having mails carried over our railroads to the extent of some seventy-five or eighty thousand miles a year. The convenience of a majority of the people of this country depends upon the regularity with which that service is performed. This man has to superintend all of it. He does not actually spend the $9,000,000 but he makes arrangements with the railroad companies by virtue of which the money is spent. He has to settle all the many controversies arising between the Department and the railroad companies as to the amount of compensation which they shall receive. The office is in my judgment one of the most difficult to discharge that we have in the Department, and it requires a degree of ability equal to that of the management of any railroad line in any part of our country. I do not care in what way the thing is got at, I do not think that the salary this man has been receiving ought to be reduced. It seems to me rather late in the day for this amount of virtuous indignation as to the manner in which the payment has been made when it has been allowed by the Senate to continue for six years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When would the Senator correct it, if it is too late in the day to discover an error?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is all right to correct it if it is wrong, but there is a virtuous indignation about it at this moment as if it were a new proposition and not a matter which has received the assent of the Senate again and again for at least six years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When would the Senator correct it, if it is wrong?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am perfectly willing to correct it now, but do not correct it by giving a man less pay for doing double the work than he received when he did only half the work.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the reason this question has not been brought before the Senate heretofore is that the salary is fixed in the law creating the office and is to be paid out of another appropriation, which is a very improper way of appropriating for a salary, to start with. He is paid out of the appropriation for the railway mail transportation. His salary or compensation was fixed by a law passed some years ago. It never comes under the revision of Congress or of its committees, and consequently it has been overlooked until the House discovered that it was an improper mode of payment and sought to correct it. I hope the Senate will agree with the House in this matter and make the correction.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, there is another feature of the service that has not been alluded to bearing upon this question, and it is that upon the rapidity of the mail service between the grand trunk lines depends the service upon other lines that are tributary to them. This agent of the Government has the whole responsibility of that service. Public opinion demands not only rapidity in the transmission of the mail but it also demands that the service be by the present method of postal cars by which the mail is distributed while the trains are in motion instead of having the work of distribution done at the different post-offices. We are thus saving at least twenty-four hours in the delivery of the mails at distant points by having the mail distribution take place on the cars instead of at the different offices. All this creates more or less friction, and it requires the attention of some single mind in order to control and adjust the matter.

There are no contracts with the railroad companies. The Government is dependent largely upon the railroad companies. While the law fixes the maximum that the roads are to receive for carrying the mail, yet it requires constant attention. This agent is required to fix the different rates, to confer with the companies, and make adjustments with them wherever friction occurs. It is known to all who have access to the Post-Office Department that very often, in fact in the majority of the cases, this agent is absent from his office here in the discharge of his duties elsewhere. While the proportion of the railway service to the general service is but 25 per cent., yet it embraces this large feature of the service which in fact controls and shapes the 69 per cent. of star service which with about 6 per cent. of steamboat service comprise all the rest.

To throw the responsibility upon one person of the management, adjustment, regulation, control, and direction of all this business which groups the whole of the railway service, at the salary of $2,500, I think is beneath a great Government like this. It requires a man of no ordinary intelligence and capacity. It requires a man who by his experience is fitted for it. None of the ordinary employés of the Government can fill such a place. It requires a man of good judgment. He is brought in contact with leading railroad men. He is the officer between the Government and the railroad companies to adjust and fix the rates finally, because there is a margin. While it has been stated here that the law fixes the maximum rate, yet frequently the Postmaster-General is unable to adjust with the companies at lower than the maximum rate. It is within our knowledge that frequently the railroad companies throw off the mails, or are unwilling to put on postal cars because they are not compensated sufficiently. This requires the immediate attention of this agent, who leaves his business here and visits the company and adjusts the matter on the best possible terms. I think when we come to consider not only the labor but the responsibility resting on this individual, it will be perceived that the salary proposed is not too much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do you not make it a salary?

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont asks why not make it a salary. The Committee on Appropriations have seen fit to do otherwise. I am only taking the aggregate amount as stated by my friend on my left, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Taking that for the whole three hundred and sixty-five days at the per diem of $5 per day and add it to the $2,500, would not be too much for such a man who can fill the place with credit to himself and justice to the Government and to the people.

Mr. DORSEY. The Committee on Appropriations follow the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They do not follow the law; the law follows them.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations thought it was best not to attempt to change the existing law, and we did not with the exception of using the word "actually" instead of the word "actively," which word they now recommend shall be changed to actively, to correspond with the law, and thus follow literally the language of the Revised Statutes. We determined not to legislate any more than we could possibly help in an appropriation bill. I desire to say for myself that I have constantly—in the other House and here—endeavored to resist all new legislation in appropriation bills. Some of the most vicious legislation that this country has ever been cursed with has been added to appropriation bills on the ground very frequently that the measure could not be passed unless it was tacked to an appropriation bill. The celebrated Morrill amendment eight or ten years ago was tacked to an appropriation bill by the Senate. The right to testify in the courts of the country by parties regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude was tacked to an appropriation bill. The civil-rights bill and all sorts of things have been added to appropriation bills. Only the other day the Senate saw fit upon an appropriation bill to take away the constitutional right of the President to look all over the country and appoint the most competent and efficient men as pension agents, and limited his power of appointment to wounded or disabled soldiers. That sort of legislation is all wrong. I could name hundreds of other instances of the same sort.

The Committee on Appropriations did not desire to do more than to adhere to the law, which was that the special agent to superintend the railway postal service should be entitled to $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses while actively employed in the service of not more than $5 a day. That is all we have said; that is what the Revised Statutes say. Yet gentlemen here talk about the Committee on Appropriations having violated the law. The House did restrict the Postmaster-General to one agent instead of allowing him the right to select two agents, as he had before; but there is a rule of that House (whether a good one or a bad one the Senate cannot interfere with it) that the House may in what they may consider the interest of economy reduce the number of employés or reduce their compensation. In the exercise of that authority they have said the Postmaster-General shall appoint only one agent instead of two, and having done so in the exercise of their right under the rule adopted by the House the Senate committee has acquiesced in their action and said substantially, "we admit your right to limit the number to one; we do not see fit to differ with you." But the fact has been developed that fifty-three agents have been receiving a per diem of $5 a day since 1872 in addition to their salary, and the Committee on Appropriations of this body, of which the Senator from Minnesota has been chairman, I believe, for the last four or five years, how long I do not know, has never interfered with it. The committee of the House, whose special duty it has been to inquire into the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, have had the subject before them since 1872 and this practice has never been interfered with. It comes with a bad grace now to say that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate ought to set aside the law, that it ought to make a new law, that it ought to disregard the Revised Statutes, remodel the whole system, correct departmental rulings, and do what the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the Committee on Expenditures of the Post-Office Department of the House have for the last six or seven years failed even to consider. If the administration of the Post-Office Department is wrong, if they have in violation of law paid $5 a day when they ought to have paid less, call upon the Postmaster-General and hold him responsible. Punish the men who have made wrongful payments to officials of money in violation of law, or change the law and make it so plain that it cannot be misunderstood. That ought to have been done long ago. It has not been done. Why the practice was allowed to continue I do not know. We do not propose to change the law to reduce the pay of one man.

I never saw Mr. Vale, the present superintendent, as I said, but once or twice; but what little I have seen of him satisfies me that he is a very able man, a man who has to perform a service that but few men can perform, and that he is entitled to as much compensation as the present law allows him. I do not propose to cut down his salary. The law allows him $2,500 a year and $5 a day "while actively employed in the service." It is for the committees of the House and of the Senate to determine what those words mean, when his accounts are passed upon, or to change the law so as to give them a definite meaning. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have not seen fit to seek to change the existing law, but propose to continue his compensation in the words of the law, and then if he is paid more than he ought to be paid let the men who pay him in excess of what the law allows him be held responsible before the country or the courts or wherever the responsibility can be settled.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend from Kentucky mean to say that the law as it now stands allows this officer $5 a day actually and absolutely, besides his $2,500?

Mr. BECK. I do not. I say that the language of our bill when perfected will be "actively" instead of "actually," so that he shall receive $5 a day while actively employed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, but what I am calling the attention of the Senator to is the present state of the law, saying nothing about this bill. Does the Senator mean to say that the law now allows this superintendent of the railway service $2,500 a year and $5 a day?

Mr. BECK. I do not say so; but I say it comes with bad grace from gentlemen who for seven years have been allowing it to go on and never found fault with it before, when they allowed it to pass for nineteen officers in the last five minutes, to raise this question over the most valuable officer in the Department, and to fasten a construction in his case that they do not seek to put upon the others. Why was not all this inquiry made when we were passing upon the fifty-three route agents?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be good enough to read the clause that gives the fifty-three men that?

Mr. BECK. "Such agents shall be entitled"——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator to be good enough to read the clause of the bill that gives that.

Mr. BECK. The bill, page 2, provides "that hereafter the per diem pay of all special agents appointed under section 4017, Revised Statutes, except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate, shall only be allowed when they are actually engaged in traveling on the business of the Department;" and nine assistant superintendents of railway service have been excepted from the change made by the House provisions by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, making nineteen as to whom the provisions of the Revised Statutes are continued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator was speaking of our making it pass in this bill, that we have given that in this bill to fifty-three men. Will he point out the place in this bill where that is?

Mr. BECK. I say that the provision retained for Mr. Vail is given to nineteen men in this bill, and that ever since 1872 it has been given to fifty-three men.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be pleased to read at the place in this bill where it gives it to nineteen men?

Mr. BECK. It is given in the samb language that we now propose to insert for the superintendent of the railway service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. BECK. In lines 18, 19, and 20 of this bill as amended on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. BECK. The provision as amended reads:

> Except such, not exceeding ten in number, as are appointed by the Postmaster-General to duty at such important points as he may designate, and nine assistant superintendents of railway mail service, as may be detailed to act as superintendents of division of the railway service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. I do not hear anything there about $5 a day while employed in the service.

Mr. BECK. Those nineteen men are excepted from the provision of the House bill and allowed to remain as they have been heretofore. It has been stated time and again to-day that they have been receiving their $5 a day for every day in the year.

Mr. WITHERS. And that is the accepted construction.

Mr. BECK. And that is the construction maintained and acted on by the Department so avowed, and it has been paid them ever since 1872, and not one word has been said against it, as we are told.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is vastly mistaken, I think, as to the construction that the Department puts upon the law as it stands, and I should be glad to see anything from the Department in writing upon that point.

Mr. BECK. The subcommittee on appropriations of the House saw in the Postmaster-General's report that the construction——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know anything about subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SARGENT. It came in a letter which has been read at the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator I think puts a different construction on the letter from what I do. I have heard of one or two postal agents in Maryland who have stated to me a different construction of the statute and that they only received $5 a day when they are doing what the House bill now provides they shall be doing when they receive it, actually traveling in the performance of their duties. By that I do not mean that they were actually on the cars, but if they were to go a hundred miles to examine a post-office and spent a day and came back, they got $5 for that day that they spent away from home while traveling.

To come back to this provision, the Senator from Kentucky says that we have been for seven years silent about this business. Supposing we had and it now turns out to be wrong, ought it not to be corrected? The Senator and a good many of his friends have been talking rather fervently about their readiness to correct all abuses that have been existing too long, but it appears on this argument that here is one that has got so old, seven years old, that it is impossible to correct it even by the democratic members of this body, who are strong on that particular line. That will hardly do, Mr. President.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, that is extremely——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator just let me finish my reply to him? Then the Senator tells us that on page 2 of the bill we have made this same provision for nineteen agents. My honorable friend is mistaken. We have left the nineteen just where the Revised Statutes leave them, that is all, be it right or be it wrong. As to this one you do not propose to stand on the Revised Statutes, but you propose to import a special and particular provision. Therefore the Senator is unjust in saying that Senators have been silent here while the same provision was being made for nineteen men.

Mr. BECK. I insist that we propose to leave this man just where the Revised Statutes place him and his compensation, and just as the other nineteen were left after substituting the word "actively" for "actually," as we propose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you have got to strike out all this provision about the allowance, because there is no provision about an allowance either for the fifty three, or for the nineteen in the bill that I can see. If anybody can point it out I should like to see it. But when you come to this particular man you are not content with the Revised Statutes; you must have a special and particular provision, differing from the Revised Statutes, by employing different phraseology, (it may mean the same or not, but phraseology is usually employed for a purpose,) to make up a greater sum of compensation, because you argue, and very justly no doubt, that this gentleman ought to have more pay.

But now, Mr. President, just turn for a moment to the honest and fair construction of this language, and then I shall have done. I have spoken too much about it already, because it is a single matter. What is this allowance for? It is "for traveling and incidental expenses a sum not exceeding $5 a day." The statute does not say he shall have $5 a day, but he shall have whatever his traveling and incidental expenses are while actively—using the language of the Revised Statutes—employed in the performance of his duties, but the maximum that he shall be allowed shall not exceed $5 a day. What does that mean in all truth, and justice, and fairness? It means that wherever this man makes an actual and necessary disbursement for traveling expenses and expenses incidental to that traveling, he may be allowed for what he actually disburses; that allowance the law intended, but not to exceed $5 a day. That is the fair construction of the statute. If any Department has construed it otherwise, that Department in my humble judgment has done wrong, and I am quite unwilling, if it is discovered seven years afterward, to be a party to any such construction of the statute any longer.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Vermont has concluded, I desire to submit, as I was going on to say, that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, have not, with all due respect to his criticism, varied the provision made for this officer from the provision made for the other nineteen, and I now propose to read the statute and to read the bill to show that what I state is absolutely accurate. Section 4020 provides that—

> The Postmaster-General may appoint two agents to superintend the railway postal service, each of whom shall be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail, a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, with an allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, while actively employed in the service, of not more than $5 a day.

The provision inserted in the House bill, and we agree with them, is as follows:

> That hereafter the Postmaster-General may appoint an agent only—

That was their right to limit it under their rule—> to superintend the postal railway service, who shall be paid, out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail on railways, a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year with an allowance, for traveling and incidental expenses while actually employed in the service, not exceeding $5 dollars per day.

We have followed the language of the statute word for word except that the word "actually" is inserted instead of "actively." With that exception there is not a word varying from the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did not the committee put in as to these fifty-three special agents provided for in section 4017 the same provision, then? The bill does not contain it as I read it. Section 4017 says that:

> The Postmaster-General may employ two special agents for the Pacific coast, and such number of other special agents as the good of the service and the safety of the mail may require. Such agents shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of not more than $1,600 a year each, and shall each be allowed for traveling and incidental expenses, while actually employed in the service, a sum not exceeding $5 a day.

When you come to the appropriation for that on page 2 of the bill you do not put anything of that sort into your bill; but when you come to the next section that provides for this postal agent, you take pains to provide in the appropriation that he shall have such and such allowances. Why is this difference?

Mr. BECK. We followed the language of the statute in providing for this special agent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did you not as to the others?

Mr. BECK. The House of Representatives saw fit to change the language in regard to the others and the Senate, with the consent of the Senator from Vermont and of all the Senators who are now making objection to this agent, consented to the change.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, the Senator, unless I misunderstand this bill, is mistaken in saying that the House of Representatives has changed this allowance at all. It says that the per diem of the special agents, excepting nineteen, shall be only allowed when they are actually engaged in traveling. If I understand that in connection with section 4017, it is that they are not to be paid at this rate of $1,600 a year except when they are actually engaged in the business. If it means the other thing, which is doubtful, I agree, that it provides for the allowance, then the House of Representatives has done exactly by these fifty-three men what it proposed to do by this postal agent, and that is only to make this allowance when he is actually traveling in the performance of his duties.

Mr. BECK. The House of Representatives changed the language which is contained in the Revised Statutes from "actively employed in the service" to "actually engaged in traveling," and nineteen have been excepted from that provision. Therefore whatever the effect of that is, it is for the Senate to determine and for gentlemen who settle the accounts of the Department to decide. All I desire to say is that in this particular case we have followed the language of the Revised Statutes verbatim, and, whatever the proper construction, it is for those who settle the accounts of the Post-Office Department or for the courts to determine. No criticism can be made on the Committee on Appropriations when it endeavored not to change the law, not to attempt to make any construction of the meaning of the law, but to leave it where the law places it; which I understand is the duty of committees on appropriations. We have no right to legislate.

Mr. WINDOM. Upon that point I would ask the Senator how he reconciles his action with reference to the change of compensation to the forty-three agents on page 2? He will find that the bill changes their compensation and pays them only when they are actually traveling. The Senator says that we have adhered to the law. Why not do it in that case?

Mr. BECK. I reconcile it in this way: the House of Representatives saw fit to cut down the compensation of those men, and very many of them, as was shown to us, are men who do very little service. The Senator from Minnesota may recollect what was said by the Senator from Virginia and others upon that subject and desiring, as the Senator from Vermont very properly said, that we on this side of the Chamber desire to cut down expenses wherever we properly may.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say you desire to do it; I said you profess to do it.

Mr. BECK. Well, we profess to do it, and we expect to carry out our professions whenever it is proper, but we do not think that parsimony is economy. We do not believe that, and we do not think that it comes with a very good grace from gentlemen on the other side to be intimating that we ought to be cutting down right or wrong. I believe when a public servant does his work well that he should be paid fairly for his work; and I do not intend on any idea of economy, or parsimony, or any thing else to demand faithful and efficient service from a faithful and efficient officer of great responsibility without granting him compensation on which he can live. There are two sets of men who can serve this country for nothing. Rich men, who have great jobs to put through, belonging to banks and other monopolies, can work for nothing, and all the employés or agents of railroads and other great corporations who get compensation outside will do this work for nothing. There is another and a worse set who can serve for nothing, but men who are honest, faithful, and competent in a country where every office is open to every man and where his poverty should not be the means of excluding him from honorable public employment, he should have a sufficient compensation for the work he does.

I believe this man, who is the sole superintendent of this railway service, has an extremely important work to perform and that he is honest, faithful, and competent, and I further believe that when he is in the city of New York negotiating with great railroad corporations for postal cars and other things, for which these $9,000,000 are expended, and when he goes to Chicago, or Saint Louis, or anywhere else, even if not traveling yet if working for the Department and actively employed in maintaining the interests of the Government and paying out his $5 a day or perhaps $10 a day while there that he ought not to draw on his $2,500 a year salary to pay for the expenses that he is necessarily compelled to incur, and that even when not traveling on cars or on steamboats, but while actively employed in great cities negotiating with railroad corporations and their attorneys as to the best terms upon which the Government can get its mails transported, his expenses should be paid. That is as active employment, that is as costly employment, that is as laborious employment and requires more of the intellect of the man who is employed, than it does while he is traveling along in the cars doing nothing. Would it be proper to pay this officer only $2,500 a year when the law gives him compensation while he is actively employed, and send him to New York and make him spend three months in arranging with the Erie road and the New York Central road and all the other roads as to what postal cars should be used, to see whether they charge the Government properly for the amount of mail matter by the pound that they were carrying, to see into the thousand other things necessary for the Department to know, and keep him there at the New York Hotel, or the Fifth Avenue Hotel, or the Hoffman House, or anywhere else, where they charge him $5 a day for his board alone? Although he is not traveling, yet you cannot properly require him to pay all his expenses while he is there out of the $2,500 allowed him. That is the idea of the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator agree to an amendment that will cover that proposition and be confined to that proposition?

Mr. BECK. I have no special feeling about this matter. In regard to any amendment that the Senator from Minnesota will offer that is agreeable to the Senate, if I like it I will vote for it, and if I do not I will not vote for it. I do not propose to change the law. I am standing by the Revised Statutes. If this agent is not entitled to that compensation while he is in New York, or Philadelphia, or San Francisco, or Chicago, and if he must pay all his expenses while remaining there and is actively engaged in this important business that he has to transact with these railroad corporations out of $2,500, and the Senate think they can retain the services of a useful, able, efficient, intelligent man, competent to transact that great work and to hold his own and maintain our rights with these great corporations and all their lawyers for $2,500 a year and require him to spend $1,500 of it to pay his own expenses while doing business for the Government, then vote down the amendment of the committee and get some inferior man who will belong to the railroad companies, who will not have brains enough to resist their applications and expose their efforts to take advantage, who can be cheated by them whenever they want to cheat, and thus enable them to make hundreds and thousands of dollars out of the Government while you are saving a dollar or two out of the expenses, when you could have an able, energetic man who would faithfully perform the service which you give him to do. You can get plenty of men who will be glad to work for $2,500 a year and pay their own expenses. The railroad companies will furnish plenty such. There is no doubt about that. There are plenty of men who would come to the Senate and House of Representatives and pay their own expenses, and be glad to do it. Plenty of men will occupy any position for nothing and look to outside rings for their pay, but these are not the kind of men that the good of the country requires should be either here or in the Post-Office Department or in any other Department of the Government.

As I said, my idea of economy is to cut down all supernumeraries and to pay men in responsible positions a fair salary for the work they are required to do, and not pinch them wherever and whenever we can. That is parsimony, and not economy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I apprehend that the difficulty arises in this case not because of any improper estimate of the services of the gentleman who is employed in this capacity, but because of the language of the Revised Statutes which it is desirable should not be altered upon an appropriation bill. In reference to the service which this gentleman confers upon the country, I believe there seems to be a very general concurrence of opinion. The importance of his office does not arise from any responsibility with reference to the fund appropriated of $9,000,000, but the importance of his services arises from the fact that his business is to make arrangements with the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails in a manner most serviceable to the business of the country. That includes not only the cars in which they shall be carried, but it includes the trains in which they shall be carried, the speed at which the trains shall run, and general fidelity on the part of the railroads in the transmission at the earliest possible moment of the mails of the country. This to the people of the United States is of the greatest importance. From what little intercourse I have had with this gentleman, which has simply been in an official relation, as I have met him in the room of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and nowhere else, I have come to the conclusion that perhaps there is no gentleman in this country more familiar with the transportation of the mails by railroad than Mr. Vail. I do not believe that what is proposed in this bill is an exorbitant salary for such an officer, and I would be perfectly willing to pay him all as a salary that is proposed to be paid here as a salary and as traveling and incidental expenses. The difficulty seems to be in so arranging the language of the provision that it will not seem to be legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. FERRY. Since the Senator from Delaware is a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and has given in some detail the labors of this agent of the Government, I want to remind him of another very important duty which he discharges, which lies at the foundation of all the compensation paid to railway mail-service, and that is the weighing of the mails. This, which is a very large and a very important item, is under his superintendency. The mails have to be weighed with a great deal of care. If there is any pressure anywhere, it is sometimes directed at that point, and we need a man not only of capacity, but of standing and integrity, to fill the position.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What has been said by the Senator from Michigan is true. I will add further, that there is a proposition, which perhaps will come before the Senate at this session, to change the mode of compensation to the railroads which would entail for the next twelve months, at least upon this officer, very important services. There will be a proposition before the Senate to change the mode of compensation to the railroads from weight to space, and all the arrangements necessary to carry out the new order of things, if that measure should meet the favorable consideration of the Senate, would devolve upon this officer, and it would be a very important service which he would be required to render.

I have myself no special fancy for high salaries. I think that those who have noticed my course in the Senate in reference to the expenditures of the Government, at least will do me the credit to say that I have not been extravagant in my ideas as a general rule; nor do I consider this measure as it came from the House of Representatives indicative of a disposition to increase the expenses of the Government. The proposition is to dispense with one of the postal agents and to place upon one man the responsibility and duty which have been heretofore devolved upon two gentlemen. This is in the line of economy. Even if we should increase the compensation to the agent we shall employ somewhat it will not amount to what both the agents have heretofore received. Therefore the House bill as it came to us is in the line of economy, and it would be in the line of economy if the suggestions of the Senate Committee on Appropriations in reference to this officer are agreed to. We ought not to increase the expenses of the Government. They have been onerous and oppressive to the people, and we ought so far as the public service will allow to be economical in the expenditures of the Government. If this were a proposition to increase the expenditures of the Government in reference to this particular service, I should hesitate long before I would vote for it. But the proposition is to dispense with one agent, and to increase to a very small extent the compensation given to Mr. Vail. Therefore it is a matter of economy rather than of extravagance to adopt the suggestions that have been made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when Mr. CHAFFEE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CHAFFEE] is detained from the Senate by sickness, and has been ill for several days.

Mr. DORSEY, (when Mr. GARLAND's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] has been unexpectedly called home by the illness of one of his sons, and since he has left I have learned that his child is dead.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I give notice now that I shall ask the enforcement of the five-minute rule and speaking but once on each amendment. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the five-minute rule is in operation and it ought to be enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take notice.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after the word "day," in line 141 of section 1, to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1878, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent. per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 155 of section 1, to increase the appropriation "for compensation to railway post-office clerks" from $1,275,000 to $1,325,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to know the necessity of that increase over the House appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is probably for incidental expenses.

Mr. DORSEY. The increase of this item is only $50,000. The estimate of the Department was $1,385,000, every cent of which, in my judgment, they ought to have to meet the increase of the mails in the West and Southwest on new railways alone. I have in my hand a letter from the superintendent of railway mail service, in which he gives the present condition of the service and the necessity for this increase, which I send to the desk to have read as a portion of my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1878.

SIR: The following in regard to the estimates for railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents is respectfully submitted for the information of the Senate Committee on Appropriations:

RAILWAY POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

By reference to table A, on page 9 of the report of the railway mail service, hereunto appended, it will be seen that the expenditures for railway post-office clerks for 1876 was $1,223,750; for 1877, $1,223,560.

The appropriation for 1878 is $1,225,000.

The miles of annual railway post-office service for the same periods were: 1876, 15,309,915; 1877, 16,898,040; 1878, over 18,000,000.

The increase in the mails handled is best shown by the following comparative statements of mails handled:

These lines are selected as they are representative roads connecting the great sections of our country and are not affected by local causes.

The increase in the mails on the roads leading from New York and New England to the South, Southwest, and West, taken from actual weighings made to adjust the compensation, is shown by the following:

	Pounds.
Daily average for February, 1877	108,000
Daily average for March, 1878	124,000

Increase, 16,000 pounds or about 15 per cent.

The weighing of March, 1878, does not include any post-office supplies, while the weighing in February, 1877, does.

In January, 1878, the Department succeeded in obtaining from the New York Central the postal facilities of which it had been deprived since July, 1876, (the road having refused to furnish them,) and from the roads between New York and Boston additional facilities.

It has become necessary to increase the postal-car facilities from Chicago to the West and Northwest, and from Saint Louis to the Southwest, owing to the great increase in the mails.

There are also some additional postal-car facilities needed in the South.

All these need increased force, and if the railway post-office service is to be extended with the increase of the mails and the extension of the railroad system, some increased appropriation is necessary or the mails cannot be forwarded with the expedition demanded by the public.

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully, &c.,

THEO. A. VAIL,
General Superintendent Railway Mail Service.

Mr. DORSEY. The Postmaster-General in his report, page 129, says:

The mileage of daily railway post-office service has increased over that in operation June 30, 1876, which include the fast mail service, forty-six hundred and twenty-five miles, and the mileage of annual service, 1,688,135 miles, although during the year the fast and limited services on the New York Central and Hudson River, Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, and Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections were discontinued, and but partially restored.

This, together with a large number of new routes and new service upon the routes in the West, require a very large number of postal agencies. That increase was about two years ago. Within the last two years there has been no increase in the number of agents and their pay, while the increase in mileage and in the amount of work to be done has been going on all the time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In addition to what the Senator from Arkansas has said, the Post-Office Department say that they ought to have $60,000 more than the amendment allows, and they say they do not know how they will get along without it; but the committee after thoroughly examining this matter and getting what information they could, made the amount $325,000, instead of $385,000 as the Post-Office Department ask.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 156 of section 1, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That postal clerks, route agents, and mail-route messengers shall not be required to wear uniform other than cap or badge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 159 of section 1, to increase the appropriation "for route-agents" from $1,020,000 to $1,030,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 162 of section 1, to increase the appropriation "for mail-route messengers" from $165,000 to $171,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the words "four million," to strike out "one hundred and six" and insert "nine hundred and sixty-two;" so as to read:

That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $4,962,274.72, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On an amendment so important as that we ought to have some explanation of the necessity for it.

Mr. DORSEY. That amendment is simply a change of the footings to correspond with the changes in the items through the bill. It is a necessary change in consequence of what we have already done.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, was in the same section, line 17, after the word "draughtsmen," to strike out "clerk, female," and after the word "clerks" to strike out "and colored;" so as to read:

And provided also, That the pay-rolls of the draughtsmen, clerks, messengers, and other employés of the topographer's office shall be regularly made out by the chief of the topographer's office, examined and checked by the appointment clerk of the Post-Office Department, and the payments thereof made by a bonded disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 23 of the same section, after the word "all," to strike out "purchases" and insert "expenditures;" so as to read:

And also provided further, That all expenditures made by the chief of the topographer's office for the preparation and publication of post-route maps shall be accounted for by vouchers, accompanied by affidavit, and the moneys therefor shall be disbursed by a disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BECK. If the amendments of the committee are through, I desire on line 140 of section 1 to strike out the word "actually" and insert "actively," so as to make it correspond with the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DORSEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer an amendment by direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, for the establishment of mail-steamship connection between the United States and Brazil by two lines, one from New York to Brazil and the other from New Orleans by way of Galveston. I send the amendment to the Chair to be read. I propose that it shall come in between lines 120 and 121 of the first section of the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be inserted will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish direct mail communication semi-monthly between the United States and the Empire of Brazil by means of two monthly lines of first-class sea-going steamships; the first of the said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New York, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, to touch at Saint Thomas, Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, both going and returning; the second of said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New Orleans, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching, both going and returning, at Galveston, and at such ports in the United States, the West Indies, and Brazil as the Postmaster-General may deem necessary and expedient; it being the true intent and meaning of this act that by the 1st day of January, 1879, service on both of said routes described in this section shall be established, to make this act effectual as to either of them from and after that date.

SEC. —. To establish said semi-monthly mail communication between the two countries, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to invite proposals for said mail steamship service by proper public advertisement in one newspaper published in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Boston, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder who shall possess the means to furnish the steamships required for the service, and who shall give good and responsible sureties for the faithful performance of the service under such contract. The two lines shall be contracted for separately, and each shall make monthly trips, that is to say, twelve round voyages per annum; the dates of departure of the steamships of the said two lines, from the cities of New York and New Orleans, to be regulated and determined by the Postmaster-General, so that said dates may be two weeks apart, as nearly as practicable: Provided, That separate contracts shall be made by the bidders for each of the two lines, and that the Postmaster-General shall not accept any bid in excess of $30 per mile per annum for each line for the distance between the termini of the routes, respectively, which distance shall not be estimated nor paid for at more than five thousand miles for each of said routes. Said contract for each of said lines shall be for the term of ten years, to begin with each line from the day on which the first steamship, as above described, of said line, may depart, from the city of New York or the city of New Orleans, with the mails for Brazil; and the first departure of a steamship of the first line shall not be later than the 1st day of June, 1878, and the first departure of a steamship of the second line shall not be later than the 1st day of January, 1879.

SEC. —. The steamships contracted for and furnished for said mail service shall be of not less than three thousand tons burden, American built and owned, and constructed of iron, after the best models, equipped with all modern improvements and approved appliances adapted for sea-going steamships of the first class, and shall be capable of making thirteen nautical miles per hour, and to be so constructed as to be readily adapted to the armed naval service of the United States in case of war; and before their acceptance by the Postmaster-General, they shall be subject to inspection and survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, and whose report shall be made to the Postmaster-General; that the Government shall be entitled to have transported, with the fare and accommodation of a first-class passenger, free of expense, on each and every steamer of said two lines engaged in this service, a mail agent to take charge of and arrange the mail-matter, and to whom suitable accommodation for that purpose shall be given; that in case of failure from any cause to perform any of the regular monthly voyages stipulated for in the contracts, a pro rata reduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; that suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the performance of the service according to the contracts; and the Postmaster-General shall have the power to determine the contract for either of said lines at any time such contract may be transferred, assigned, or underlet to any other party; and the said steamships shall at all times be subject to the use of the Government at reasonable rates of charter-party therefor.

SEC. —. That the mail steamships employed in the service authorized by this act shall be exempt from all port charges and custom-house dues at the ports of arrival and departure in the United States: Provided, That a similar immunity from port charges and custom-house dues is granted by the government of Brazil.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order if my friend from Texas does not. If he rises to a point of order, I do not wish to interrupt him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that this is contrary to the twenty-ninth rule of the Senate, which provides:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate.

Mr. MAXEY. I was going to observe that, according to the RECORD, on the 2d of May I was instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report this amendment which I did and by the direction of the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee on the 7th (as appears in the RECORD) through the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] made this report:

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DORSEY. From the same committee I report back an amendment to the bill just reported, offered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, so that the latter committee can move it in the Senate. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations do not formally express an opinion upon this amendment, and certainly nothing adverse to it.

So that I apprehend the proper course has been taken to bring this within the rule. The amendment came from the Post-Office committee, was formally presented in the Senate, and by the Senate was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations reported it back to the Senate in order, as they say in their report, that the Post-Office Committee may offer it as an amendment to the bill in the Senate. This course has been pursued.

Now, as to its being germane; I very readily admit that I am not very familiar with the rules. I do not pretend to be; I do not suppose I ever shall be; but I apprehend that the bill which we have under consideration is a bill making appropriations for postal service. When a bill making an appropriation originates in either House it may be amended in the other. If it originates in the House of Representatives, the Senate may make an amendment thereto. Even in the case of a bill for raising revenue, which is required by the Constitution to originate in the House of Representatives, the Senate may make amendments. This is an amendment to a bill making appropriations for postal service. It has gone through all the formulas so far as I know anything about what the rules require. It comes here and in my judgment is germane to the bill under consideration. That is all I care to say about the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not make the point of order on the twenty-seventh rule that it had not been moved by direction of a standing committee, or that it had not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That appeared to have been done; but my point of order is based on the twenty-ninth rule, in that it proposes general legislation upon the subject of sea service with Brazil, and in that it is not germane to this bill which appropriates money to carry out existing laws.

Mr. MAXEY. I am certainly, as the Senator from Vermont admits, strictly within the purview of Rule 27, and I cannot see how Rule 29 has any application whatever. This is not general legislation in regard to any matter which might come up, but is legislation directly pertinent and germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One word on the point of order. Without expressing any opinion upon the merits of the amendment, in my judgment it certainly is in order. It is well known to the Senate that all amendments have had wide scope. If I mistake not, the civil-rights bill was held in order by the Chair on a judiciary appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not under this twenty-ninth rule as it now is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Very little difference. There may be some words different; but it amounts to the same thing in substance, as I understand. There is hardly anything that has not come on appropriation bills when it was deemed necessary for a purpose, as this is, of course, for it is plain to see that this purpose is to carry the mails; and therefore I should think without any question, and without expressing any view of the merits of the proposition, that the amendment is in order.

Mr. FERRY. In my judgment if there is any point to this question of order, it is upon the general character of the legislation proposed by the Senator from Texas. I cannot possibly conceive how a branch or division of the mail service can be considered "general." Certainly there must be special and general, and a branch of the service between this and Brazil does not cover all the mail service of the United States Government, so that I cannot understand how this can be considered as general legislation. It is specific. General legislation would cover the whole mail service of the country. This is but one arm of it, foreign instead of domestic. And so far as the relevancy of the amendment is concerned, this is mail service and that is mail service, and I cannot see how that question can be raised. But so far as the question of relevancy is concerned, the rule provides, to avoid the friction which has occurred between the Chair and the Senate in just such cases as this, that wherever a question of relevancy occurs it shall be submitted to the Senate. I take it, then, the only thing now for the Chair to do is to submit the matter to the Senate upon the question whether this is general or special legislation.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the honorable Senator who just sat down, and who is so eminent an authority on parliamentary questions in this body by reason of his great experience in the Chair, why it is that a provision in the post-office appropriation bill providing for carrying the mail over a new route, which has not been a postal route before, is inadmissible? Is it not because the law which creates the new postal route is general legislation, and solely on that ground?

Mr. FERRY. The rule, I take it, was to avoid the practice of the Senate of putting innumerable mail routes upon the mail-route bill. If I understand the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts, it is in reference to the putting of service upon new routes or authorizing the establishment of service upon new routes.

Mr. CONKLING. Does this route exist by law now?

Mr. HOAR. That is the point.

Mr. FERRY. All routes are made post-routes.

Mr. CONKLING. But is there provision of existing law for transmitting mails to Brazil?

Mr. FERRY. No.

Mr. HOAR. That is the precise point.

Mr. CONKLING. My impression is—I speak with uncertainty—that there is a general provision for sending mails upon the navigable waters on which mails have been carried before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the statute read.

Mr. FERRY. My impression is that wherever there is steamboat service on the waters that is declared to be a mail route, and when that service is taken off it ceases to be such.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be good enough to show us the law for that.

Mr. FERRY. I state it as law. I understand that there is mail service now between the United States and Brazil.

Mr. BECK. By way of Liverpool.

Mr. FERRY. By way of Liverpool one way, and from Brazil here direct. Mails are sent by steamers that run, but they are not running regularly, because there is no contract between the Government and those steamers. They simply get the sea postage for the service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to correct that? There is a regular line between New York and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, which runs regularly and has been running for twelve months. They carry the mail.

Mr. FERRY. I accept the correction in part. I stated that there was mail service between the United States and Brazil, but not regularly carried. In other words, the steamers do not depart at stated periods. They depart whenever it is convenient, and that seems to be an objection to that service, and adds force to the proposition of the Senator from Texas who now seeks to have an established line leaving at certain defined periods.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the law does not provide for the establishment of the line now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the Senator from Michigan is still laboring under a mistake. I understand that the Merchants' line of steamers from New York to Brazil runs regularly, that there are three steamships employed in that service, that they have now been carrying the mail regularly for the last twelve months, and that it is an established line by which the mails of this country are sent directly to Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. FERRY. I think the Senator from Delaware is correct in part, but not wholly. I made inquiry at the Post-Office Department and found that the mails were sent not only by this line but by any steamer that plies between the United States and Brazil. The steamers leave New York whenever they can get freight. They reach Rio de Janeiro and lie there until they get freight enough to pay for their return. They do not leave at stated periods, as is proposed by this amendment or as provided for by the contract of the Emperor of Brazil with a certain steamship-owner. They have to leave at a certain day, and in case they fail to leave at that time they forfeit pay for that trip. That is regular defined service. But the present condition of the service between the United States and Brazil is incidental and accidental, although there is a line of steamers running between the United States and Brazil as best they can.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it is settled by the practice of both branches of Congress, a practice which has existed for many years, that a law which requires the transportation of the mail over a new route is general legislation, and it is not in order to propose that in either branch as an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill without first having secured the passage of a law making it the legal duty of the Department to take the mail over that route.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me right there, that seems to be necessary on land; but we have a general provision that all the waters of the United States during the time the mail is carried on them shall be mail-routes.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. I was coming exactly to that. Now, it is general legislation to require by law the conveyance of a mail over a new route. It is true that all the waters over which the mail is actually carried at a particular time, in particular directions, from one particular point to another, are made postal routes by the act which the Senator has cited; but unless they are so made postal routes by the existing and established lawful practice, which this is not, then it is general legislation to make them postal routes, either by inserting them in a general bill or by establishing a line of mail service over them.

But it seems to me that this proposition is liable to the objection which has been raised, by reason of many provisions in it other than the simple provision establishing a direct mail communication semi-monthly between the United States and the Empire of Brazil. The last section enacts:

> That the mail steamships employed in the service authorized by this act shall be exempt from all port charges and custom-house dues at the ports of arrival and departure in the United States.

The last section but one authorizes the use of the steamers by the Government at reasonable rates of charter-party to be determined by the Postmaster-General. It is not confined to a simple provision for the transportation of the mail over an existing established route by sea, but it contains other provisions.

Mr. FERRY. So far as the features of the proposition are concerned, I think they correspond with a similar contract made by the Emperor of Brazil with certain parties to transport the mails between that empire and the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not help it any.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont says that does not help the matter any. It helps it so far as this, that it shows that this case is specific, that it does not apply to other sea routes, and therefore it cannot be considered as general legislation. I am surprised at the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the establishment of a simple route between two points, twenty-five miles apart, on which there is no service, declared to be a post-route now by legislation, can be considered in any sense as general legislation. It is the application perhaps of general authority to a specific route. Certainly it cannot be general legislation. It does not apply to other points except those two terminal points with intermediate space.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be general legislation in this bill for me to move that the salary of the Postmaster-General should be $10,000 a year, although it only applies to one officer?

Mr. FERRY. No; I should say not. He would have to include all the officers of the United States to make it general. I think that comes under the same rule, that it is taking out of the general fund money to apply to a specific person; therefore it cannot be general legislation. Now I take the ground that "general legislation" must apply to all the railroad routes in the railroad branch of the service; and if it is the sea service it must apply to all the sea service alike and be of general character. Now, this is a specific route between the United States and Brazil. It has restrictions pertaining to that, peculiar to that service.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Michigan will allow me to ask if he means to say, because I understand him to say, that a provision which should apply to every mail route in this country except the route from the Baltimore and Potomac station to the General Post-Office in Washington would not be general legislation, because it did not apply to every other route?

Mr. FERRY. No more than it would be general legislation if there should be an appropriation for the mail service between here and the city of New York. The appropriation of nine millions of money, as proposed by this bill—I give it in round numbers—is general legislation because it covers all the mail service of the country by railroad; but to appropriate for a specific route, whether between here and New York or between here and Boston, is special, not general. I cannot see how by any construction it can be characterized as general. It must be general, if it is so, upon some principle. It does not cover the whole area; it does not cover the whole mail service of the country; it does not cover the whole appropriation for the mail service; and upon what principle can it be considered as general? It is specific, just exactly as is the service between any two points in the United States. It is between New York and the city of Rio de Janeiro; this special route, this special service cannot be general legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is an attempt to ingraft legislation upon an appropriation bill. Notwithstanding the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas proposes to make an appropriation for the post-office service of the United States, the object and intent, the real purpose is to establish a line of steamers between the United States and Brazil and to obtain a subsidy therefor. In other words it is an attempt, under the pretense of making an appropriation for mail service, to establish a subsidy and to support a line of steamers by means of a subsidy. That the services of this line of steamers as mail carriers would be worth $150,000 or anything like that, between New York and Rio de Janeiro or between New Orleans and Rio de Janeiro, no one can pretend. But the object of this amendment is as to our commercial relations between the United States and Brazil, thereby to build up trade, traffic, commerce, between certain portions of the United States and the city of Rio de Janeiro.

As was stated by the Senator from Delaware, we have information that already a line of steamers is plying between New York and the city of Rio de Janeiro. They do not run at regular stated periods, but they do perform mail service for the United States and a service for merchants of the United States whenever there is business to perform.

I have in my hand a letter which I shall send to the Clerk's table and ask to have read, from the agent of this line, giving information on this subject, addressed to a member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and I have also, which I will send forward, a statement of the sums that have been paid to this line of steamers for the transportation of the mails, or in other words for the mail service that it has rendered. I find that during the year 1878, in the months of January, February, and March, this mail service has been rendered and it has cost the Government at the rate of $103 a month instead of at the rate of $12,500. Then to say that this is proposed simply as an aid to the mail service of the country, it seems to me is a mere pretext. It is intended to aid in promoting the commerce of the country. That is a question to be discussed, it seems to me, at another time, on a bill that distinctly presents the question whether the Government and people of the United States are prepared to maintain lines of steamers between the ports of the United States and foreign countries by paying subsidies and granting tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars for the purpose; in other words, whether it is for the interest of the Government and people of the United States to maintain lines of steamers that cannot maintain themselves, out of the Treasury of the United States, for the purpose of promoting the commerce of the country? I have said this much and now I ask that these papers be read.

MAY 9, 1878.

Hon. BENJAMIN A. WILLIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.——

Mr. MAXEY. I make the point of order not knowing what the paper is, that it has nothing to do with the point of order pending.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Tennessee will suspend his remarks for a moment, the Chair will state that not having that great familiarity with the rules and precedents of this body which is only acquired by long experience, he would prefer to submit the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the rule that is the only place where it can be submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the fortieth rule?

Mr. INGALLS. No; the twenty-ninth rule.

Mr. CONKLING I should like to inquire of the Senator who sends this letter to the desk, whether I heard him aright in supposing that he said the letter proved that there was an established service, although an irregular one, between New York and Rio?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I cannot say, nor do I remember that I did say, that it proved it. I offered, simply for the information of the Senate, a letter addressed to a member of the House of Representatives, in which certain facts are cited, or what purport to be facts, in regard to a line of steamers plying between the city of New York and the city of Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. CONKLING. And carrying the mail?

Mr. BAILEY. And that has carried the mail.

Mr. CONKLING. Then my suggestion to the Senate is that it does relate to the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. The language employed by the Senator from New York was whether it proved this. I do not say that it proves it, but it does relate to the point of order. The point of order that was made, as I understand, is that this is an appropriation bill, and it is proposed by distinct legislation, upon an amendment offered to an appropriation bill, to establish new lines or to establish new post-office routes, or in some other way to change the existing law, or, in other words, to enact general legislation. I endeavored to maintain the propriety of the objection made by showing that this is not intended really to make an appropriation for the postal service of the Government, but is intended to establish a line of steamers and pay a subsidy therefor, and that the effort looks not to the perfection of the mail service of the country but looks alone to the establishment of commercial relations and to the enlargement of the commerce of this country with another country. I ask that the letter may be read.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. If I understand the honorable Senator from Tennessee his point is that there being a proposition to establish a line of American steamships to a certain port, he wants to show that that is not in order because there is a line of British steamships running there now. That is the whole of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine what he means by a line of British steamships? Does he mean that they are owned and controlled by British interests alone, or that American citizens have an interest in them?

Mr. BLAINE. I mean by a line of British ships vessels that sail with British registers and under the flag of Great Britain. As to the private ownership I, of course, no more than the Senator from Delaware would be competent to speak; but I speak of an American line of ships as one that is registered in the United States and bears the American flag. I speak of a British line of ships as one that is registered in Great Britain and bears the British flag. As I understand the point of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, it is that it is not in order pending an appropriation bill for the United States postal service to propose an American line of steamships on any route that is already occupied by a British line of steamships.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all, Mr. President, I do not say that it is not in order to do this, that, or the other; but I say it is not in order under the pretense of doing one thing to do another. The question before us to-day is not whether we shall open the ports of America to the shipping of foreign states; it is not whether we should maintain our navigation laws; there is no question of that kind here. It is no question of American or British ships, or whether they shall be navigated by American or British sailors; but it is a question of whether this amendment is intended really to enlarge the postal service of the country or to enlarge the commerce of the country. That is the question and the only question. I ask that these papers be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays on this question of order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. On what question are the yeas and nays to be taken?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has submitted to the Senate the question whether this proposition offered by the Senator from Texas is in order; and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. Prior to that, if the Senator from Vermont will permit, I have asked that written papers which I have sent to the table may be read. I think I have a right to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the communication unless there be objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MAY 9, 1878.

Hon. BENJAMIN A. WILLIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant——

Mr. SARGENT. By whom is it written?

Mr. BAILEY. It is written by Mr. Borland, of the city of New York.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask if debate is in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I think I have a right to have the letter read as part of my remarks.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I inquire if debate is in order; and if debate be not in order, then I submit the reading of this letter is not in order, that being in the nature of debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope there will be no objection to the reading of the letter which the Senator from Tennessee asks to have read as part of his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, debate is in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the rule which expressly provides that debate shall not be in order on a point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That rule only applies to the question of relevancy. On the first question as to whether this amendment is general legislation, the rule against debate does not apply; and here both questions are involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that debate is in order, as the question submitted is under the first clause of Rule 29. Now the reading of the paper will be continued unless there be objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MAY 9, 1878.

Hon. BENJAMIN A. WILLIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, to which I beg to reply as follows:

The steamers of the Merchants' Line are English steamers of one thousand tons or thereabouts, built of iron especially for the trade with Brazil, carrying cargo, passengers——

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the further reading be dispensed with. It is evident the Clerk cannot read the letter.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Clerk will send it to me I will read it myself.

Mr. DORSEY. It is evident this letter has nothing to do with the point of order, and it is also evident that the letter is so blurred that the Clerk cannot read it. I suggest that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire what authority the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Nebraska have to interfere with the delivery of the speech of the Senator from Tennessee. [Laughter.] It is a part of his speech and he has sent it there to have it read as a part of his speech, and I do not think any Senator can step in and move that further debate be dispensed with.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from Tennessee acknowledges that to be his speech, I am content that he shall go on.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from Tennessee is ready to proceed with his remarks, I certainly shall take my seat.

Mr. KERNAN, (to the Chief Clerk.) Send him his speech.

Mr. BAILEY. I asked that the letter be read for the information of the Senate. As a matter of course, it is always understood that it is a part of my remarks. If the Clerk is unable to read it himself, if he will send it to my desk I will undertake to read it myself. [The paper was returned to Mr. BAILEY.] This is a letter addressed by the agent of the steamship company to Mr. WILLIS, Representative in Congress from the State of New York, dated May 9, 1878.

MAY 9, 1878.

Hon. BENJAMIN A. WILLIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 8th instant, to which I beg to reply as follows:

The steamers of the Merchants' Line are English steamers of one thousand tons or thereabouts, built of iron, especially for the trade with Brazil, carrying cargo, passengers, and mails for Pernambuco, Bahia, and Rio de Janeiro, in the order named; have for the past fourteen months afforded to the Postmaster-General regular and punctual and the only means of direct steam communication with the coast of Brazil; do not run on schedule time, (assuming that by that you mean a uniform speed each voyage, departure at and arrival upon a date fixed by the Post-Office, and delivery of mails within a given time,) but our sailings from this have been regular and punctual, and, so far as I know, have been satisfactory to the Post-Office authorities, both here and in Brazil. The sailing dates from this port are fixed from six to eight weeks ahead, and the steamers have hitherto sailed upon that rate, the cargo being aboard in good time to admit of sailing at the hour fixed. The usual time occupied on the round voyage is from sixty to seventy days, according to weather, condition of markets, and supply of coffee, and the health of the port of Rio. The ships are rated A 1 at Lloyd's, one hundred years in Liverpool book, and are staunch, strong, and suited for the trade. They are comfortably fitted for carrying six to eight first-class passengers, but not in the style of the ocean steamers to England and Europe. Thus far the accommodation has been in excess of the passengers.

The comparative merits of the steamers of our line and those of the best French and English steamers to Europe are difficult to determine, so many elements other than speed having to be considered; but I may say that for the mere conveyance and transportation of cargo we do not run the boats to their utmost speed, and studying time made on the passages our boats appear to disadvantage.

To your eighth inquiry, I am honestly constrained to reply that in accommodation and tonnage our boats do not conform to the requirements of the bill regarding speed. I am reasonably safe in saying their capability is so, but is kept in reserve. In building place, ownership, flag, tonnage, and accommodation, they fail to meet the conditions of the bill. But I think it is but fair to myself to say I do not desire on behalf of myself or my principals, the owners of this line, to be a competitor for the benefits of this bill. The stipulations and provisions of the bill have been too carefully worded to admit of any person or company, except the one in whose interest the bill was provided, from availing of its pecuniary advantages. And while I cannot come in as a competitor, I claim at the hands of the Congress of the United States equitable and just respect of vested interests, particularly when these interests are endangered and threatened by the special legislation which is so evident in the bill now on passage. The steamers of the Merchants' Line, although under the disability of a foreign flag, are quietly and unostentatiously serving to develop the trade and commerce of the two greatest nations on this hemisphere, (no inconsiderable amount of which has for years passed through my hands and is still passing,) it has carried satisfactorily the United States mails, receiving therefor a nominal but equitable recognition from your Postmaster-General and is ready to continue to do so in the future if required. Relying upon freighting alone, these steamers are conducted on economical and purely commercial bases, are ample in capacity for all the demands of a legitimate business in a normal condition of the markets, and ask no favors, or assistance, or exemption from either this or the Brazilian government, but only not to be legislated against by favorable legislation for a competitor whose existence and history are the future. The business between the United States and Brazil cannot be developed safely or beneficially by subsidized steamers. The commercial enterprise and investment of capital must induce adaptation of products, and interchange, which will follow in due course, will cause traffic and trade over sea for which vessels and steamers will be needed and used, but the steamers and vessels first will not produce the commerce. Under any circumstances the means of communication and transportation will certainly appear as soon as there is trade sufficient to warrant it. Commercial men are wide awake on such matters and if the trade can be secured in a natural and legitimate way without subsidy, I fail to see the need of granting one at this time, when there is absolutely no necessity for it.

Allow me most respectfully to call your attention to the inclosed extract from the Buffalo Express, and apologizing for thus occupying your valuable time, a liberty I have presumed to take knowing that this city, its interests, and commercial importance, are matters of moment to you, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

R. B. BORLAND, Agent.

There is a paper accompanying this letter, giving the sums paid by the Post-Office Department to this line of steamers for the transportation of the mails, which I ask may be read for me.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Amounts paid by the Postmaster-General to the Merchants' Line of steamships of New York for carrying the United States mails from New York direct to Brazil.

Mails per steamah p Cassini, March	$52 36

Mr. THURMAN. I believe debate is not in order on this question which is to be submitted to the Senate, but I think I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to say a very few words upon it in explanation of the vote I shall give.

Mr. President, this is a bill making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. The amendment proposes to pay for the transportation of mails between certain ports of the United States and Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil. The first question which suggests itself is where do we get the authority to provide for the transportation of these mails and to pay for that transportation? We certainly do not get it under what is called the post-office power. That is a power to Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads," and I suppose that no one will contend or ever has contended that by "post-roads" is meant a sea-going service such as this to a foreign country. Then, if the power exists, it must be under one of two other clauses in the Constitution: first, under the commercial power or, secondly, under the power to maintain a navy. It was on this latter clause in the Constitution that the first subsidy bill of this character was advocated in Congress more than thirty years ago, and the bill provided that the ships should be so built that they should be suitable for the Navy of the United States and might be taken by the Government at their cost or their value—I forget which—whenever the Government saw fit to appropriate them; and therefore it was said that the bill came within the power of Congress to maintain a navy.

I notice that this amendment provides that these ships shall be so constructed as to be readily adapted to the armed naval service of the United States in case of war; but there is no such provision as was contained in the bill to which I have referred, the first bill of this character, that the Government may take them at its will whenever it sees fit to do so at the value or the cost whichever it then was.

But if I am right in saying that the word "post-roads" in the Constitution does not include the route from the United States to Brazil, entirely a sea route, then it follows as I have said, that we must find in some other clause of the Constitution, possibly in the commercial clause, or in the clause authorizing the maintenance of a navy, the power to pass this amendment. If that be so, then is this not general legislation; or, to put it in other words, is it germane to this bill? The twenty-ninth rule prohibits general legislation on an appropriation bill, but it goes further than that and prohibits "any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill," and says that no such amendment shall be received. Now this is a post-office bill; it is a bill for the service of the Post-Office Department; and if we have no power under the post-office clause in the Constitution to provide for such a service as is proposed in this amendment, then is the amendment germane or relevant to the bill; and if not, is it not general legislation?

Although the question is not entirely free from doubt, it seems to me, according to my best judgment, that this question must be answered that it is general legislation, and that it is not relevant to the subject-matter of this bill. I come to that conclusion the more readily because of the great evils that have resulted and will continue to result to the country if we attach to appropriation bills anything like general legislation. An appropriation bill ought not to be made the carrier of new schemes or new ideas. It ought to be limited simply to appropriations provided for by law, and therefore I am inclined to resolve all doubts against any amendment that does not come clearly and undoubtedly within the scope of the appropriation bill; and I shall therefore be compelled to vote that this amendment is not in order.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to have the views of the Senator from Ohio on one point. He says that the constitutional power to establish service between New York and Brazil is not derived from the post-office clause. Where, then, is the power derived to establish service between New York and New Orleans by water?

Mr. THURMAN. The power to establish a line of steamships from New York to New Orleans, I do not think, unless it were within the waters of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the United States, can be derived from the clause granting power to establish post-roads.

Mr. CONKLING. Under what provision of the Constitution do we proceed as to Mexico?

Mr. THURMAN. It must be the same thing. If my friends will look at the debate on the first subsidy bill, which was in the year 1845 or 1846, in the House of Representatives, and where the subject was fully discussed, I think they will find that very few contended that the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads" included the power for sea service, unless indeed that sea service were such as you might have across Lake Erie or Lake Superior or running from Wilmington, North Carolina, to Charleston, South Carolina, within our own waters.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to invite his attention to section 4007 of the Revised Statutes, as I really wish his opinion upon that section? If there be force in the Senator's argument, if he be right, we have no authority to make a contract to transport our mails outside of the admiralty jurisdiction. I think, then, that he must come to the conclusion that this section is entirely unconstitutional.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend misunderstands me. I have not said that we have no such power. What I have said is that it cannot be derived upon any fair interpretation from the post-office clause in the Constitution. I have not said that under the commercial power we might not provide for the transportation of the mail.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the Senator's argument went to the full extent of the power.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio. He draws a distinction between the waters of the United States and the open sea as to the source of the constitutional power to establish postal service.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no doubt that within the waters of the United States, along the Mississippi River, or within a marine league of the shore, you may call it a post-road within the meaning of the Constitution; but I say that when you leave the territory of the United States, then the power to pay for the transportation of mails must fall under the commercial power or under the power to maintain a Navy. My own impression is that it falls under the commercial power.

Mr. WITHERS. Take the route from New Orleans to Galveston. How is the mail carried there? How is the mail carried across our great lakes between Canada and the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. Precisely under the commercial power, for the commercial power extends to commerce, not only with foreign nations but between the States.

Mr. WITHERS. But the contracts are made by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care what they are made by, or by whom. They might be made by anybody else that Congress should think proper to direct. The question is where is the power; and if the power is not one that properly belongs to the Post-Office Department, then this is general legislation that is not relevant to this bill.

Mr. FERRY. Then we understand the Senator from Ohio to say that within the marine league, within the waters of the United States, the power is derived from the post-office clause of the Constitution, but beyond the league, the three miles, it is derived from the commercial clause of the Constitution. Now the statute declares:

> The following are established post-roads:
> All the waters of the United States during the time the mail is carried thereon.

So that within the marine league the power is derived from the post-office clause. How is it possible to establish a mail route between New York, New Orleans, and Rio de Janeiro without passing through the league? Then the Senator invokes two powers under the Constitution to establish the mail line, and declares that because the constitutional authority comes from the commercial part of the Constitution therefore this is not germane to this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. This debate on a point of order has taken rather a wide range and I shall not transgress the bounds by reading a brief extract of a letter, the whole of which has been read, because I think the letter presents one of the most remarkable scenes in itself that ever occurred in a legislative assembly. Here is a proposition in the American Senate to do something for American commerce, and an agent of an avowed British line of steamers has read in the Senate a protest against the United States doing that thing. Let me read for the benefit of the Senate (for I do not think they could have all heard it) what this modest agent says:

> And while I cannot come in as a competitor I claim at the hands of the Congress of the United States equitable and just respect of vested interests, particularly when these interests are endangered and threatened by the special legislation, which is so evident in the bill now on passage. The steamers of the Merchants' line, although under the disability of a foreign flag, are quietly and unostentatiously serving to develop the trade and commerce of the two greatest nations on this hemisphere, (no inconsiderable amount of which has for years passed through my hands and is still passing.)

Is not that cheek? Here is a British line of steamers put on the sea while the negotiation was going on with the Emperor of Brazil by the American agent in Rio de Janeiro. They tried to bully and bribe and buy him off there, and they could not do it. The Emperor of Brazil, not desiring this line, gave to the American ship-builder contracts for ten years to carry his mails to the United States; and in order to prevent any possibility of direct trade growing up in that way the English, who have elbowed us entirely out of the South American trade, immediately put on a line of three steamers; and well may the agent say that no inconsiderable portion of the whole commerce between Brazil and the United States is going through his hands! It does not take a very large pair of hands to handle all we send out to Brazil; but lest it might grow larger this British agent comes into the American Senate and says: "Do not interfere with our vested rights; I claim here in this letter just and equitable protection in the American Senate for British vested rights between the chief ports of the United States and South America;" and a Senator of the United States—I do not think he comprehended exactly what he offered when he had it read, for I have great respect for him as a Senator, and for his opinion as a Senator generally—presents that in an argument in the American Senate. Let the Senator move to amend the bill and make it a bill to protect and prolong the monopoly of Great Britain for all the trade between the United States and South America. That is what this agent demands of us; that is what this agent says. He says, "Hands off, I demand a just and equitable protection of vested rights," avowing himself as the representative of an English line of steamers, and he speaks of the disability of a British flag! Surprises will never cease.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offered that letter for the purpose stated, to show that this amendment to an appropriation bill was not intended, as it purports, simply to establish mail communication between the United States and Brazil, but to promote commercial relations between the United States and Brazil; and it was upon a question of order made by the Senator from Vermont. I did not choose to go into a general discussion of this question; nor do I propose to do so now; nor do I offer myself as the advocate of British interests any more than the Senator from Maine; but I do appear as an advocate of the interests of the American people, of those whose money it is proposed here to vote away. For what purpose? To promote mail communication between the United States and a foreign country? Not at all, but to promote the commercial interests of a particular section of the country, or a particular interest, or a particular person or particular ports, I do not care how it may be described.

Allusion has been made to the circumstances under which this line of steamers was established. I know nothing about them and care nothing about them; and a discussion of that question is foreign to the issue now presented to the American Senate. I understand the Senator from Maine to say that a negotiation had been pending between the Emperor of Brazil and a certain citizen of the United States, and a contract was made between this citizen and the Emperor of Brazil, by which he agreed for a certain consideration to put a line of steamers between an American port and the commercial metropolis of the Empire of Brazil. The terms were stipulated and a certain sum was agreed to be paid. It is generally known here that a contract was made, signed, sealed, and delivered, that ships have been built, ships have been launched, ships are sailing now upon the broad ocean to carry out that contract; and, notwithstanding that contract exists, an American Senator appears here now and offers to vote a part of the money of the American people to maintain that contract. The contract exists, and the parties to it are bound by it. Its terms must be observed; its stipulations must be performed. But, notwithstanding that, we are to give a bounty, not for the purpose of maintaining this line of steamers, but for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of the man who has obtained that contract with the Emperor of Brazil.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, this is a question of order, and I try to be orderly myself in this body; but I believe the only real method of proceeding here and the only way to be in order is to be out of order. What has all this discussion to do with the question before the body? I confess it needs perception much clearer than any I possess to see it. I cannot comprehend it. I have just one word to say upon this question of order, and I will try to make myself understood without saying how much there may be in the point I make or not.

I must, however, before stating the precise point, be permitted to make myself intelligible. On referring to your statutes you will find that they declare all the navigable waters of the United States to be post-routes. Then they go on to declare that the Postmaster-General may send letters in any vessel, either an American or a foreign bottom, between the ports of the United States, or between foreign ports and a port in the United States, and allow to the master or owners of that vessel two cents a letter. I think that establishes pretty conclusively the opinion which I entertained that we have no right, we have no power, we have no authority to establish a post-route outside the admiralty jurisdiction. In other words, we cannot establish a post-road from New York to Brazil, or from New York to Liverpool; but I hold that we can make a contract with an American citizen—and I am in favor of an American citizen over a foreigner—to transport the mail between any of our ports and any foreign port on the face of the globe; and I say that the statutes have clothed the Post-Office Department with all the authority we possess, and we have now to-day upon the statute-book a section of law which authorizes the Postmaster General to enter into a contract for transporting the mail between any port in the United States and any foreign port when in his opinion it shall be best and expedient so to do. I will read the section.

Now, that being the law, it establishes all of a post-route that we can establish between a foreign port and one of our own. It is not a post-road, but it clothes the Postmaster-General with the authority to make these contracts. That I hold we may do; and now I hold that this amendment submitted by my friend from Texas is simply carrying out the existing law which I am about to read. It is true that it has conditions about it; it provides the kind of vessels that shall be employed, and it adds the amount, and it provides further as a matter of safety, and to bring it perhaps within that other clause of the Constitution with which I am somewhat familiar, as the Senator from Ohio and myself both remember the original discussion very well, to bring it within the commercial power also, that these vessels shall be made and constructed so that they may be converted into Government use whenever the Government shall require it. This section then clothes the Postmaster-General with that authority and this measure is one simply extending and carrying out a contract upon that section—I will read it—and hence I come to the conclusion that it is in order:

> The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contracts for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interests will thereby be promoted.

That is all of a route that we can establish. If we were to consider this matter separate and alone and pass it into a law we should make no more of a post-route in it than that section to which I have referred made it. This, then, is only applying the service to that contract; and in that view I think it is within the rules of the Senate.

Besides, I think I should agree with the Senator from Vermont; very likely I would agree with him if he had raised this question thirty years ago and it had at that time been settled, although I am not quite sure that thirty years is a long enough period of time. If he or somebody else had then raised the question as an original one, I might have agreed with him; but when I know that the practice of this body has been consistent and persistent in admitting this kind of legislation upon your appropriation bills for all the time I have had any knowledge here, I must conclude that taking the case as it is presented and the practice of the Senate, it can leave no doubt upon my mind.

Senators will remember that at the last session but one, I think, of Congress we had all kinds of legislation here. I am not talking about the expediency of it, but the practice and the right under the the rules. I think at the very last session of Congress we incorporated into this very bill a long list of post-routes, in almost every State, if not every State and Territory in the country.

I have perhaps not made myself as clear as I ought, but I have stated the point as it presents itself to my mind.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 13, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of last Saturday was read and approved.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order this morning is the resumption of the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers. Upon this bill, which was reported by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] from the Committee on Commerce, the main question has been ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. According to the understanding on last Saturday, I submit a motion to reconsider the vote ordering the main question, in order that the bill may be further considered by sections as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair advises the gentleman that if the motion to reconsider should prevail, the bill will be divested of the operation of the previous question, which now requires its consideration prior to the morning hour. In that case the regular order might come in and this bill might have to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. What would be the effect if I should wait until the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair distinctly stated on Saturday that if the previous question was not sustained and the main question ordered the bill would go over as unfinished business until Tuesday. It comes up this morning because of the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered on the bill and amendments. But if a motion to reconsider should now be adopted, the bill would be divested of that quality which brings it up this morning. The Chair thinks that then the morning hour of Monday would come in, which might be followed by other matters, so that this bill would go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. REAGAN. I had supposed that the bill would come up this morning as unfinished business, with the understanding that, the main question being reconsidered, we should continue the consideration of the bill by sections for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never held that mere unfinished business would interrupt the morning hour of Monday or the suspension of the rules on Monday, for the reason that any class of business going over as unfinished should go over until a time when the rules provide for the consideration of that class of business.

Mr. REAGAN. I make this inquiry of the Chair: if the motion to reconsider be now made and adopted, will the bill have precedence as unfinished business after the morning hour of to-day or will it go over till to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will come up after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. It will then take precedence as unfinished business

The SPEAKER. It would come up as unfinished business, the theory being that, when the House determines to consider a bill, that bill should remain before the House until some action of an affirmative or negative character has been taken upon it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand there are several gentlemen who desire to offer amendments to different portions of the bill; and I suggest to the gentleman in charge of it to ask unanimous consent that amendments be offered pending the previous question, and that the vote be taken upon them as they are offered. Then the bill would remain under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. BUCKNER. The bill had better go over till to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. I am willing that the course suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] should be taken; that the question be submitted to the House whether it will give unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. For all amendments or for such amendments as the gentleman from Texas may designate?

Mr. THOMPSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow any amendments which any gentleman may desire to offer.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly; I should have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Debate would be cut off, the House will remember, upon all such amendments.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the ordering of the main question cut off the right to close the debate or does it leave that open?

The SPEAKER. It does not cut off the right of the gentleman from Texas in that respect.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the vote upon the first pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I submit the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The effect of which will be to allow this bill to go over till to-morrow morning as unfinished business.

Several MEMBERS. Why not?

The SPEAKER. The business for to-day is set forth distinctly in the rule; and the only reason why this bill comes up at all in preference to the usual business is because the main question is operating upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that I can do better than to make the motion and let the bill go over till to-morrow morning.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Is it now in order to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The SPEAKER. The bill goes over till to-morrow morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask general consent to make a report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which I think there will be no objection. If there is I shall move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the morning hour or as soon as practicable under the rules. The regular order having been demanded the Chair has no volition, but must announce the business of the morning hour on Monday.

The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock a. m. This being Monday, the first business during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for bills and joint resolutions for introduction and reference to appropriate committees. During this call memorials and joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order for reference.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I move by unanimous consent the call be continued until all the States and Territories have been called.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] asks leave of absence for one week for the benefit of his health.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

The SPEAKER. In consequence of the leave granted by the House, the Chair now asks consent to recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] out of the order of his list of gentlemen to be recognized for suspension of the rules to move a suspension of the rules at this time.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear the subject of the gentleman's request, reserving till then my right to object.

The SPEAKER. It will be read by the Clerk.

THREE-CENT AND FIVE-CENT COINS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask general consent of the House (I think there will be no objection) to report and have passed a bill which is unanimously approved by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4704) to retire certain silver coins now in use, and to provide for the exchange of subsidiary silver coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the five-cent and three-cent silver pieces shall not hereafter be coined; but all heretofore coined of these denominations shall be taken up, and fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall be given in exchange for them when presented, at the several coinage-mints of the United States, in sums of $5 or over, and, when taken up, shall not again be reissued, but shall be coined in pieces of other denominations of like currency; and the difference between the nominal and bullion value shall be defrayed from the silver profit fund.

SEC. 2. That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20 in full payment, and shall be taken up and legal-tender money given in exchange for them when presented at the Treasury of the United States in sums of $20 or over.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the entertainment of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, who moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill just read be passed.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 153, noes 19.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a question of privilege, and send to the Clerk's desk a resolution for the investigation of alleged fraud in the late presidential election in the States of Louisiana and Florida.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, after the resolution is read will there be opportunity to object that it does not present a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to reserve all points.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, the State of Maryland has by its Legislature formally declared that due effect was not given to the electoral vote cast by that State on the 6th day of December, 1876, by reason of fraudulent returns of electoral votes from the States of Florida and Louisiana; and

Whereas an affidavit by Samuel B. McLin, chairman of the board of State canvassers of the State of Florida, for the election held in that State in November, 1876, for electors of President and Vice-President, has been made public, alleging false and fraudulent returns for votes for such electors in that State whereby the choice of the people of that State was annulled and reversed, and that the action of the board of State canvassers in making such returns was influenced by the conduct and promises of Hon. Edward F. Noyes, now a minister for this Government to France; and

Whereas it is alleged that a conspiracy existed in the State of Louisina whereby the republican vote in all the precincts of the parish of East Feliciana and in some precincts of West Feliciana, at the general election in November, 1876, was purposely withheld from the polls to afford a pretext for the exclusion by the returning board of that State of the votes cast in those precincts for electors of President and Vice-President and that James E. Anderson, the supervisor of registration of East Feliciana, and D. A. Weber, the supervisor of registration of the parish of West Feliciana in that State, in furtherance of that conspiracy, falsely protested that the election in such precincts had not been fair and free, and that the said returning board thereupon falsely and fraudulently excluded the votes of the said precincts and by means thereof and of other false and fraudulent action by the said returning board, the choice of the people of that State was annulled and reversed and that such action of the said Weber and Anderson was induced or encouraged by the assurances of Hon. John Sherman, now Secretary of the Treasury of the United States; and

Whereas the gravity of these charges, the nature of the evidence upon which they are reported to be based and the official dignity and position of the persons named in connection with the said frauds make it proper the same should be inquired into to the end that the honor of the nation may be vindicated and the truth as to such elections made known; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee, consisting of eleven members of this House, be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the aforesaid allegation as to the conduct of the persons in office aforesaid in respect of the said election, and into the alleged false and fraudulent canvass and return of votes by State, county, parish, and precinct officers in the said States of Louisiana and Florida, and into all the facts which, in the judgment of the said committee, are connected with or pertinent thereto; and that the said committee, for the purpose of executing this resolution, shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and in their discretion to detail subcommittees, with like full authority of said committee in every particular, and with power to sit in Florida and Louisiana, which subcommittees shall be committees of this House; and the chairman thereof shall be authorized to administer oaths; that the said committees and subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and may sit during the sessions of this House and during the vacation; and that said committee do forthwith proceed in this inquiry and have leave to report at any time.

Mr. POTTER was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that this resolution is not a question of privilege, and does not show on its face anything which this House can sustain as such. I make the further point that the action provided for in the resolution changes the rules of this House. It not only gives very extraordinary privileges and powers to a general committee, but undertakes to give to a subcommittee and to the chairman of a subcommittee power which the law does not permit in regard to the administration of oaths. I ask the ruling of the Chair in the first place upon the question whether this is a question of privilege.

Mr. POTTER. Will the Chair hear me one moment as to the question of privilege? Mr. Speaker, one would suppose that if there be any subject entitled to preference in the order of business in this House it is a resolution introduced because of the memorial of a sovereign State touching the official conduct of high officers of the Government and relating to frauds alleged to have occurred and to have changed the result of the election of the highest officers of this Government.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me one question in this connection? Has this memorial to which he refers been committed to the gentleman from New York so that he has any such possession of it as would authorize him to draw such a resolution?

Mr. POTTER. I am now speaking to the question of order. Later, if this resolution shall be admitted and if I should have an opportunity to say anything, I shall be happy to make answer to the inquiry just put by the gentleman from Michigan.

As to the question of order, it seems to me that to state this case is to argue it. If, for the reason that appears upon the face of this resolution, this inquiry is not privileged, nothing can be privileged. If the House of Representatives ought to give preference to the consideration of any subject over its ordinary business, surely a subject of this nature and magnitude must be one of those to which it ought to give preference. I do not think it can be necessary to make any further suggestion in reply to the gentleman from Michigan. As to what he has said about the tenor of the resolution, that matter will arise properly after the resolution is admitted to be discussed.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair hear me a moment on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, questions of privilege are distinctly stated in the rules, even to the extent of enumerating them, so that every man's mind may well grasp the subject and see of what nature they are. On page 287 of our Manual and Digest of Rules there is an enumeration of the various questions of privilege that may arise. The remark is made that of course all cannot be given, "but the following list," it is stated, "embraces all that have arisen." Then follows a specification of these questions: "Election of a Speaker;" "right of a member to be seated;" "election of President;" "contested-election cases."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this is a question of privilege at all, it comes under some such principle as applies to the questions I have just enumerated. For instance, it must be a question in which action is sought, and not a question of expression of opinion upon the subject-matter. The election of a Speaker is enumerated, and that means that any resolution proposing to go to the election of a Speaker is highly privileged. Even after the election in the beginning of a Congress a member may rise in his seat, I take it, and by a resolution declare that the House shall proceed to an election, making it privileged. The right of a member to be seated is a privileged question, because upon it action is to be taken, a member is to be seated or another member turned out, or a vacancy is to be filled. So generally as to contested-election cases. In this category is found the election of President. On these principles, and these only as such, this can be here.

I await with solicitude the ruling of the Speaker. If this resolution, however deprecatory it may be in language, means that this House is to enter upon, as it would in the election of a Speaker or in the seating of a member, the practical question affecting the election of a President, thereby intending to subvert accepted results, then there may be some claim that it is a question of privilege. But as an expression of opinion, as for instance if I should rise and offer a resolution that the gentleman from New York or his title to his seat here was affected by rumors, and as an expression of opinion it was desirable to settle history on that, the Chair would undoubtedly at once rule it was not a question of privilege, because no action was intended. I put it squarely to the Speaker, and upon that, as I have said, shall await with solicitude his ruling, whether, under the provisions of the rule, this is a resolution calling for action on the election of President, which action must be in the direction of attacking the legality of the title of the President of the United States, to the subversion, it may be, of that title and the expulsion of the incumbent. All that is involved if this question belongs here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York bases the ground of his claim this is a question of privilege upon the fact that the memorial which he recites in the preamble of his resolution is a memorial from a sovereign State, and is therefore entitled to a very high place in the consideration of this House. I think the gentleman from New York is unfortunate in planting his case upon that ground. The States of this Union are represented here by individual members who are elected to speak and vote for the States and in no other way whatever except by petition can a State of this Union be heard on this floor. By a recent modification of our rules—I say recent, for in the first eighty years of the history of this Government the State had no other means whatever of being heard except by the voice and vote of individual representatives and by petition; but in the year 1867 this House so far modified its rules as a matter of courtesy to the State and not as a matter of their right to permit what I will now read. The end of the one hundred and thirtieth Rule, the last clause of which was enacted in 1867, is in these words:

And on said call—

That is, the Monday morning call—joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.

"May be introduced." But for this they could only present petitions in the box by the hand of a member. The courtesy of the House was extended in 1867 to joint resolutions of the Legislatures of the States. So far from constituting the action of the State a question of privilege, that rule, after eighty years of action without the privilege they now enjoy, this courtesy was extended to the Legislatures of the States to let them be heard through a joint resolution in the Monday morning hour. And that, not because the State had a right thus to be heard, but because as a matter of comity the House extended that privilege.

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman from Ohio deny to a State the right of petition as given in the article of the Constitution which states——

Mr. GARFIELD. The right of petition they would have, of course.

The SPEAKER. As provided for, wherein it is stated that Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Speaker's reference to the right of petition is entirely unnecessary in this connection.

The SPEAKER. It is analogous.

Mr. GARFIELD. The right of petition was discussed on the presentation of the Maryland resolutions. Everybody admitted the unquestioned right of petition; but the right of action here on this floor is a different thing. The question which rises to the dignity of a privileged question depends upon the right of action which some one can demand of the House. A member here can demand action in regard to his right to his seat.

Anything that leads to an action relating to these high questions of privilege of course can be called a privileged question. But this memorial received here by the courtesy of the rules of the House, and not as a matter of right, except as a petition, cannot now by any form of logic be raised to the dignity of a question of privilege.

Now, I say another thing. This would be a question of privilege without any doubt provided the resolution alleges a purpose to institute proceedings in impeachment. If he says this is a proceeding intended to pave the way for an impeachment doubtless it may be made a question of privilege.

If he says that it is a proposition by this House to raise and determine the question of the title of the present Chief Magistrate to the office which he holds, then I answer him that that question has been determined by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress, and is as much beyond the reach of this House as the election of Grant or Washington.

Again, if the object of this resolution is merely to organize a committee for campaign purposes, to make campaign literature for the coming fall, I affirm that the exigencies of a political party have never yet been treated as a question of privilege.

Furthermore, there is in this resolution—and I reserve the point of order after the point now raised shall have been settled—a proposition that the committee shall have the right to report at any time, and that they shall have the right to sit in recess. Neither of these things can be effected by a majority vote if it comes to that, and I reserve on them the points of order when the time shall have arrived. I conclude by saying I am glad that at last after this proceeding has so long been hanging over the country we now know what they are seeking to do. For some weeks I have been inclined to say to these gentlemen in the language of Hamlet in his advice to the players:

Leave off your damnable faces and begin.

Mr. HALE. I desire to say that if the resolution is sustained as being a question of privilege before the House, I have an amendment I desire to offer before the question is taken.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me say one word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The gentleman from Ohio was one of the electoral commission. On the 9th of February, 1877, he decided on the question of Florida. He voted in the affirmative along with Messrs. Miller, Strong, Bradley, EDMUNDS, Morton, Frelinghuysen, and HOAR—eight, including himself, against seven. At that time he held, according to the report—

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde on the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the Legislature, or of the executive of Florida, subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose.

The gentleman from Ohio has a convenient conscience or rather a convenient logic. At that time it suited his purpose not to allow the States to come in at all. It was aliunde. Now it suits his purpose, since these "damnable faces have begun," to keep out the States from presenting their grievances for inquiry under fresh allegations and proofs, so that they are not permitted to come here, hardly even by courtesy, as was held by the gentleman the other day when the State of Maryland presented that petition.

It seems to me, therefore, that whatever we may do, whatever steps may be taken to reach and unravel this great transaction, we cannot at least agree with the gentleman from Ohio when he says that all these questions were and are outside the record. It would be strange, indeed, if we cannot hear from the States on a subject so momentous in its tenor and consequences.

So far as a question of privilege is concerned in this matter it seems to be a high question, one of the highest. It is one of the categories in our book of rules: "Election of President." Whether the ruling referred to in the Digest (on page 287, Journal second session, Forty-fourth Congress, pages 555, 556) refers to the matter of questioning the election of a President when the count is pending or whether it refers to other and subsequent matters challenging the count, I have not examined, nor is it necessary. They are of equal importance and dignity. But an election of President and all that concerns it, is a question of privilege. Non constat, but it may lead to impeachment or its preliminaries. So far as this resolution goes, the very terms of the resolution fix some sort of charge upon certain officers, a Secretary of the Treasury, a minister abroad, and in that respect it is a question of the highest privilege. It is so according to the dictum of the gentleman from Ohio himself. Therefore, if he be correct in saying that this is a question of privilege, if it should proceed until it reach to impeachment, then, according to the very terms and intent of the resolution, impeachment in the end may be reached by this process.

Mr. CONGER. In answer to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and partly in answer to the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] I desire to say that the very memorial upon which this whole matter is based is not before the House. It is not in the possession of the mover. But it has nothing to do with it. This House has received the memorial of the State of Maryland, whether as petition or memorial or whatever it may be, and this House has referred it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and there that memorial is, in the hands of that committee. It is not before this House for any earthly purpose, then, until the House discharge that committee or the committee report it back to the House.

Now, sir, I cannot understand by what rule any member of this House can assume under color of any pretended question of privilege to lay his hands upon the memorial and state it has been received by the House and has been referred to a committee while that memorial still remains with that committee, and assume himself to use it and bring it in a roundabout way before this House.

The gentleman from New York is not even a member of the committee. He has no access to that memorial. He lays hands upon it in violation of the order of the House placing it in charge of the Committee on the Judiciary. If I might characterize it I would say that it is disrespectful to the House for him to claim his right to act upon it when the House has otherwise directed. If I might characterize it, I would say that it is disrespectful to the committee of this House to whom the memorial and the subject have been referred, without discharging that committee, for any member to put his hand upon that memorial and bring it in here and make it the foundation of action while he has not, neither has the House, the memorial in its possession.

But, sir, I admit that, if this is a question of privilege at all, any member of the House may bring up, then, any memorial of the legislation of any State, which has been of sufficient importance to command the attention of its Legislature, of sufficient importance that they should put their views, their weight, their request, their directions in the form of a joint resolution and send it to Congress or to this House; that, too, is a question of privilege which any member may call up any day at any time and move that it be referred to a special or other committee. I speak of that because that is the naked proposition made here, that the wishes of a sovereign State make the question a question of privilege; and, if that be so, our Journal is full of the notices of the presentation of the joint resolutions of many if not all of the States of this Union, and it would lead to this, that any gentlemen catching the eye of the Speaker could claim that the joint resolution of any State, no matter to what committee it had been sent, no matter how the House may have disposed of it, could raise the question of privilege, and gentlemen could rise as often to a question of privilege as such resolutions have been presented to the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall assume, from the study I have given to the rules and to the question of privilege, that, if this be decided a question of privilege, it will be so decided independent of the fact that the memorial comes from a State. I shall assume that it is decided to be a question of privilege because, as the gentleman from New York claims, and I was glad to hear him claim it, it relates to the election and tenure of office of the President of the United States, and to the tenure of the office of the present incumbent. I admit freely that, if it does embrace that question and proposes to open the question of the election and incumbency of the President, if that be involved in this resolution logically and properly, and action by this House is to be taken in reference to the election and to the occupancy of the incumbent, it is a question of privilege.

Otherwise, and for the reasons given by the gentleman from New York, I maintain that such a decision would carry with it the right of members continually to raise questions of privilege upon every resolution sent here from every sovereign State in the Union.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I cannot see any sound reason why this may be considered a question of privilege in this House; and, as there is nothing so dangerous as a precedent, it is well that we should make a right precedent in this case. The right of petition is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and it is a privilege of which the people cannot be deprived; but that does not extend to the present consideration of the petition. The privilege of the people of the United States to petition this body extends only to the reception of their petitions. They have a right to petition, but they have no right to exact of this body the present consideration of their petitions.

This whole question was brought before the Congress of the United States many years ago, I believe when John Quincy Adams presented petitions for the dissolution of the American Union. The question was then very thoroughly discussed, and the result of that discussion was that the petitions were received, laid upon the table, and not considered, and that was a fulfillment of the constitutional requirement. But it cannot be claimed that under the right of petition the State of Maryland can demand that the House shall leave all other business under its rules and require it to investigate any subject which she may bring before the House. That right cannot exist under that provision of the Constitution, and if it exists at all it must exist not under the right of petition. It can only exist under that power in the Constitution which gives the right to the House to originate impeachments, to charge the President with high crimes and misdemeanors, and to bring him before the bar of the Senate for trial. To do that there must be charges against him, charges of sufficient gravity to place him on trial for impeachment.

Gentlemen say that there are frauds charged in the election by which the President of the United States obtained his position. Will it be forgotten by the members of the House that all these alleged frauds were once investigated by investigating committees of this House, and the competent body under the Constitution, the Forty-fourth Congress, declared the present incumbent of the Presidency duly elected under the Constitution and laws. Why, sir, the right of trial by jury is a privilege, one that touches as close to personal liberty and safety as any other that the citizen enjoys. But will any one say that, when a citizen has been arrested, brought before a court, and tried by a jury, his privilege still exists and he has a right to be tried again by a jury? His privilege no longer exists; and the exercise of the power by the Forty-fifth Congress over the question of the election of President of the United States is a usurpation. We have no power over that question at all. By the Constitution of the United States that power to inquire as to who was elected President of the United States was vested in the Forty-fourth Congress, and when that Congress spoke or failed to speak on that question, when it made a law by which it abdicated that power conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States, it parted with it forever, and so far as this, the Fourty-fifth Congress, is concerned there remains not a shadow of authority to investigate the election of the President.

The only power we have over the President at all is the power to impeach him for some high crime or misdemeanor which he himself has committed, not for the frauds which others may have committed in order to bring him into the Presidency. If we have the right to investigate how Mr. Hayes was brought into the Presidency, then we have the right to investigate how any man occupying the executive chair of this nation was brought into it. We might go back through them all, even to the days of George Washington, and unravel charges of fraud connected with the election of any President.

Such power exists not in this Congress. Whatever power Congress had over the question as to who was duly elected President of the United States was committed by the Constitution of the United States to the Forty-fourth Congress. And on the 4th day of March, 1877, when that Congress expired, all power over the question as to who was duly elected President of the United States passed away from Congress; and any attempt in this Congress to investigate and undo what was done by the Forty-fourth Congress declaring Mr. Hayes President of the United States is nothing short of a usurpation of a power not granted by the Constitution of the United States. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege raised by the objection of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is a question of privilege only as to the order of business in this House. The privilege asked for is the privilege of having now considered the preamble and resolution sent to the Clerk's desk.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that the memorial of a sovereign State never rises in the order of business to the dignity—that was his phrase—of anything beyond a memorial to be referred to a committee. I submit that depends upon what the subject of the memorial is.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] insists that if this resolution is received, then resolutions touching every subject upon which States have ever memorialized Congress shall for all time be considered as entitled to a preference in consideration. No, Mr. Speaker; question of privilege depends upon the manner in which a question is reported to or brought before the House; upon the subject-matter involved, and upon the person at whose instance it is set in motion.

The privilege which this resolution is entitled to arises, first, from the fact that it is set in motion by the formal action of a sovereign State; and, second, from the nature of the subject-matter to which it refers. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] are quick to declare that if I will say that the purpose of this resolution is to impeach and unseat the President of the United States, then they will admit that it is in order. And the gentleman from Michigan even said that he was glad to understand from my colleague [Mr. COX] that fact might possibly be its result. Mr. Speaker, I make no declaration of the kind; I absolutely and positively refuse to declare any such purpose.

My purpose is only to inquire; and if the construction which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] gives to the rule is right, that the privilege in respect to the election of President is only to inquiry in regard to his election before he is seated, or with a view of unseating him, then it is a construction that prevents this House inquiring into frauds which have been successfully committed and have come to light after their successful accomplishment.

Now, if there is anything in the character of a fraud which should deserve to be inqired into, it is when it has been successfully accomplished, and when the confession of people who took part in bringing it about or other facts connected with it have become known after its accomplishment. If we refuse to inquire into a fraud which has been successful, then we encourage the commission of frauds hereafter; and so far from securing we jeopard the peace and the security of the country.

The SPEAKER. First, as to the question of privilege; the other points of order of course will be reserved until presented.

The issue involved is a new one in the history of our country. An examination of the basis upon which the preamble and resolution are introduced is proper. The Legislature of the State of Maryland passed a joint resolution touching the subject treated of in the preamble and resolution just read, a copy of which has been remitted to this body, received and referred, and is within the knowledge of the members of the House. The following language is used:

> That due effect has not been given to the electoral vote cast by this State on the 6th day of December, 1876, by reason of fraudulent returns made from other States and allowed to be counted provisionally by the electoral commission and subject to judicial revision—
> And further—
> alleging that the returns from Louisiana and Florida, which were counted for the present occupant of the executive chair, were fraudulent and void.

Here is the appeal of a State of this Union to the Federal legislative power for the correction of a high grievance said to have been committed in the States of Florida and Louisiana against the rights of the State of Maryland, in having by fraud, in said States of Florida and Louisiana, produced a different result in the election of a President and Vice-President from that actually decreed by the people themselves at the polls.

Whether these allegations can be sustained by proof is not for the Chair to consider. It is enough for him to know that they come from a power which within the limits is recognized as sovereign by the Constitution, and that the issue involved runs to the welfare of the people of all the States. Nor is it within the range of propriety for him to express an opinion as to how far such investigation should go to reach the facts, nor what limits should be set up as to remedies to be provided against a recurrence of such like events.

A higher privilege than the one here involved and broadly and directly presented as to the rightful occupancy of the chief executive chair of the Government, and the connection of high Government officials with the frauds alleged, the Chair is unable to conceive.

The Chair finds enumerated among the questions of privilege set down in the Manual the following: "Election of President."

The Chair therefore rules that the preamble and resolution embrace questions of privilege of the highest character, and recognizes the right of the gentleman from New York to offer the same.

Mr. REAGAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. The other points which I make——

The SPEAKER. The other points are held in reserve, of course, till they are formally presented.

Mr. CONGER. I have not specified those points; but I desire that they shall not by any discussion be cut off.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, was I recognized?

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have the sense of the House upon the ruling of the Chair, and therefore take an appeal from the decision.

Mr. REAGAN. I believe I am recognized by the Chair, and I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan appeals from the decision of the Chair, which is first in order.

Mr. REAGAN. I addressed the Chair before an appeal was taken.

The SPEAKER. It is the right of the gentleman from Michigan under the rules to take an appeal. The Chair will, however, hear the gentleman from Texas momentarily.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that while I shall vote in accordance with the view that the resolution presented is a question of privilege, I wish to place that vote upon a ground that demands my approbation. I say, sir——

Mr. CONGER. I submit that debate is not in order.

Mr. POTTER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. REAGAN. I have only a few words to say. I hope gentlemen will not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter. The gentleman from Michigan appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from New York moves to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. REAGAN. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable, I believe.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I am taken off the floor in order that this motion may come in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter.

Mr. REAGAN. But I want to say what I have to say now, before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no remedy unless the House gives the gentleman unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. The Chair had the power to let me retain the floor as I had it, without allowing another member to take me from it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair having made his decision was bound first to recognize an appeal from that decision. Surely the gentleman from Texas will not controvert that position.

Mr. REAGAN. I would not if that motion had been made before I took the floor, but surely there was no appeal pending when I was first on the floor.

Mr. FORT. I trust the gentleman will be allowed to go on by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask that unanimous consent be given to hear the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. There has been objection.

Several MEMBERS. Who objects?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. No objection has been heard on this side. Who objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] objected. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKS. An appeal having been taken, if the gentleman from Michigan yields the floor and the gentleman from Texas is accorded the floor——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan did not yield the floor, but made his appeal; whereupon the gentleman from New York moved to lay the appeal on the table. That is the history of the proceeding.

Mr. CONGER. I have the appeal in writing, but I can state the points.

The SPEAKER was about to put the question, when

Mr. CONGER said: I ask that my appeal be read.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has reduced his appeal to writing, and the Chair thinks it is his right to have it read.

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly; but I object to a speech.

Mr. CONGER. I had not finished the statement of my appeal, and therefore I have the right——

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to anything in the nature of a speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman from Michigan for any remarks, because he had entertained the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CONGER. But I had not finished my statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is desirous to hear the appeal read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Chair having decided that the resolution presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] involves a question of privilege, from that decision the undersigned appeals.

OMAR D. CONGER.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CONGER. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAYLER. For the sake of observing the formalities of the House, I would suggest that the rule requires that two members shall append their signatures to a formal appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always recognized an appeal when made by any one member.

Mr. GARFIELD. I append my signature, if necessary.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 108, not voting 55; as follows:

So the appeal was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, said: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. STEPHENS, is paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with Mr. POWERS. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. My colleague, Mr. CABELL, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania; my colleague, Mr. HARRIS, with Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon; and my colleague, Mr. HUNTON, with Mr. HANNA.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. My colleagues, Mr. HART and Mr. BAGLEY, are paired on this question. If Mr. HART were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MULDROW. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is paired on this question, but I have not been able to understand with whom. He is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. COVERT. On all questions of a political character I am paired with my colleague, Mr. TOWNSEND. Personally I regard this as more a semi-legal than a political question; but I will yield to the judgment of others who differ from me, and shall refrain from casting my vote. If my colleague were present, I would vote in the affirmative. I wish further to announce that my colleagues, Mr. QUINN and Mr. BAKER, and Mr. VEEDER and Mr. STARIN, are also paired on this question.

Mr. EICKHOFF. I am paired with Mr. BALLOU. If he were present, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were present, I would vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am paired with Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BISBEE. If he were here, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. COBB. My colleague, Mr. FULLER, is paired with Mr. OVERTON. If Mr. FULLER were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WAIT. I have to announce that Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon, is paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I am paired with Mr. RICE, of Ohio. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. PEDDIE. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. LANDERS. If he were present, I would vote in the negative and he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. NORCROSS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MORSE. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. BREWER. My colleague, Mr. WILLITS, is paired with Mr. ROBERTS. If Mr. WILLITS were present he would vote in the negative.

Mr. STARIN. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. VEEDER. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. CABELL. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. WATSON. I am paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky. If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. MCKENZIE. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. KNOTT, is paired with Mr. FRYE.

Mr. STENGER. My colleague, Mr. MAISH, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. POLLARD. I am paired with Mr. DOUGLAS, of Virginia.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. POTTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have all points of order reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under some obligation to recognize the gentleman from Texas. The rights of the gentleman from Michigan in reserving all points of order will be protected.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, while I shall vote for the adoption of this resolution I desire to say a word in reference to the grounds upon which I shall place that vote that this resolution involves a question of privilege. For I should not like to have either myself or those with whom I act politically go before the country upon a wrong reason if the right one existed. I agree with my colleague and friend who spoke a short time ago, that the petition which has been received by this House from the State of Maryland, and referred to the Judiciary Committee, of itself does not present a privileged question, and it must be disposed of regularly as all such petitions are disposed of under the rules of the House.

And I desire to state distinctly that that portion of the memorial or resolution from the Legislature of the State of Maryland which looks to the institution of legal proceedings to retry the question of the election of the President is a thing which cannot be done by this House, as that was a political question settled by the highest political authority, and settled under and in accordance with the rules which control the action of Congress. The courts cannot and will not take jurisdiction on a political question of that character. Besides, the authority which could determine the title of the President to hold his office has acted on it and settled that question and we cannot now disturb it.

And probably I might go still further and say it would be to the best interests of the country that we should not disturb it. While, therefore, I cannot vote for the resolution upon the ground that the petition of itself involves a question of privilege, or that we have the right to reopen and retry the question of the election of the President, I do maintain that the resolution as offered by the gentleman from New York, in making a charge that great frauds were perpetrated in the election of President and Vice-President, and in which it is charged that one now acting as Secretary of the Treasury and one now acting as a foreign minister were participants in those frauds—I maintain that that charge of fraud against those officers does raise a question of the highest privilege which may be investigated by this House for great public reasons. It is just to the country and it would be right to those gentlemen that such a charge having been made should be investigated. I therefore vote for the resolution, because, in my judgment——

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman from Texas has no right here to give a construction to a resolution upon which we are voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair might suggest that the gentleman is following many other gentlemen in the like circumstances in the mode of discussing a question. The gentleman from Texas is certainly not out of order.

Mr. CONGER. The discussion of this question may make the points of order too late if the Chair does not reserve them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not shut out the gentleman from Michigan from his right to make points of order on the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to the gentleman from Texas giving his views of the effect or meaning of the resolution until it comes before the House in the regular course of debate.

Mr. REAGAN. If the resolution is before the House, I think I am not out of order in stating the reasons why I support it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. REAGAN. And I believe I have now said all I wish to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER. I wish to inquire of the Chair if there are other questions of order in regard to the resolution not yet disposed of?

The SPEAKER. There is no question of order pending; but the Chair has received notice that there will be questions raised as to points of order.

Mr. POTTER. I understand I am entitled to the floor as against anything except points of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] as entitled to the control of the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I now repeat the statement I made a short time ago as to the point of order, that this resolution cannot be adopted without a suspension of the rules or without a two-third vote, because it changes the rules of the House in several material respects: first, in granting unusual powers to the select committee; second, in permitting—which is a violation of the law, or at least enlarges the law—the chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths. And I make the further point, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution involves an expenditure of money and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POTTER. I understood the gentleman from Michigan to make the point of order on this resolution that it provides for the administration of oaths by the subcommittees provided for in the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I ought to have added that I make the point of order on the power of sitting in recess. I stated that before.

Mr. POTTER. Now, I understand the law gives certain officers, including the chairmen of committees, the power of administering oaths; and it is because of that provision of law there has been inserted in the resolution a declaration that the subcommittees which may be appointed under the resolution shall sit as committees of this House, in order to have the very power to which the gentleman refers.

Now, as regards the power to sit in recess, I agree the committee has not the power to sit in recess without the permission of the House, and therefore it is that the resolution provides it shall have power to sit in recess. And I had supposed that was the part of the resolution which would have been particularly agreeable to gentlemen on that side; and I am quite surprised at the point of order coming from them in regard to it.

As regards the third point of order, which I understand is raised by the gentleman from Michigan, that the resolution appropriates money, I desire to say that it appropriates the fund of the House for purposes of the House, and therefore does not go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that the point of order is not that we cannot authorize this committee to sit during the recess; but it is that a majority vote of the House cannot authorize a committee to sit during the recess. It is that that must be done by a suspension of the rules; because it is one of the rules of the House that when the House adjourns it carries with it all its committees except such as by a suspension of the rules have had their power projected into the recess. This has always been recognized; so far as I know it has never been denied at any time.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to respond to the proposition of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to one point, the only one so far as I know among those made by the gentleman from Michigan which is deserving of any very serious consideration; that is, the question of the relation of this resolution to the rule of the House which provides that no committee shall sit during the vacation of the House without special leave.

Mr. Speaker, this matter is not without precedent, and the usage has been settled by the almost uniform action of the House from the beginning. It grows out of what is laid down in the old Manual, that—

> Committees may be appointed to sit during the recess by adjournment, but not by prorogation.

A note in the Digest, page 189, has been appended, to this effect:

> This has been construed (and in view of the distinction which exists between a "session" of Parliament and of Congress, very properly so) not to restrain a committee of the House, with the leave of the House, from sitting during the recess between a first and second session of Congress.

Now I undertake to say that the leave of the House has always been the leave of a majority of the House and that my colleague from Ohio can show no instance in which either a two-third vote to suspend the rule or the suspension of the rule by unanimous consent has been declared to be necessary to authorize a committee to sit during the recess between the first and second sessions of any Congress. On the same page and prior to that——

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman mention a single instance where the question has been raised and decided as he says?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes, I can and I will do it now, as the gentleman has called attention to it. If he will refer to the Journal, Thirty-second Congress, page 1119, he will find that precisely this point has been decided in one case very analagous to this, and one which my colleague will well remember, because it involves our former illustrious fellow-citizen, Thomas Corwin. In that case a resolution was offered providing for an investigation of the connection of Thomas Corwin, then Secretary of the Treasury, with the Gardiner claim, in which precisely the same power to sit during the vacation and to examine witnesses under oath was granted. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the connection of Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, with the Gardiner claim, have leave to sit in the vacation and to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath.
> Mr. Edgerton moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.
> The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER. The resolution in that case was carried by a majority vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. But was there a point of order made upon it?

Mr. SAYLER. There was a point of order raised in connection with the resolution, but it was upon another question. This is a specimen of what has been the uniform practice of the House, and it is stated in the Digest, which is accepted as the law of the House, that it is quite common to grant this privilige to select committees at the time of their organization.

I want to say further that the power to sit during the recess between sessions of Congress is expressly affirmed in the Digest as the custom of the House. The gentleman from Ohio asked me to cite an instance, and I cited one in which it was done, and done without objection. Now I challenge him to cite an instance to the contrary. It has been customary to couple with a resolution to investigate the power of the investigating committee to sit during the sessions of the House, or between the first and second sessions of the House, or until the final adjournment of any Congress, and that may be done by a simple majority vote of the House, or by the leave of the House thus expressed.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has utterly failed to show any case where the point was raised and decided. I can give him a case much stronger than the one he cites, much stronger if I reason from his stand-point. A few days ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] offered a resolution for a special committee on the next census and I suggested that it ought to have power to sit during the recess and he added the words "with power to sit during the recess," and that resolution was adopted, not by a majority vote, but by two or three members voting "ay." Why? Because nobody objected or raised the point of order, and whether it has been done hundreds of times or thousands of times in that way, that has no bearing upon the question unless the gentleman can show that when the point was raised that it could be done by a majority vote, it was so decided.

Now, the gentleman admits that the general rule of the House is that all committees die with the session so far as their power to continue in session is concerned unless they have leave of the House. That is the ordinary and normal operation of the rule so that a committee stops when the House adjourns finally. That rule must be changed, or any committee is overriding the rule which goes on and holds sessions during the recess; his argument, therefore, is perfectly fatal to his proposition, and I have really never before known anybody hold that a motion for a committee to sit during recess could be adopted without a suspension of the rules.

This question has been sprung upon us suddenly. I have not looked into the precedents, but I have not the slightest doubt that I can find abundant cases where resolutions of this kind were objected to because they could not be passed without a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. As to the first point made by the gentleman from Michigan, as to the power of committees to sit during the recess, the Chair will reserve its decision for a moment. The second point, that the giving of power to the chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths is in violation of the law, not being authorized by section 101 of the Revised Statutes, nor by the rules of the House, the Chair thinks that that point clearly belongs to the committee and that they can determine it when they convene, in case they are authorized.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will allow me a moment. That question was raised, I cannot refer to the precise time, on the action of a committee in the Forty-third Congress. It was discussed—I have not been able to find the point—and a request was made of the House to authorize the chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths.

The SPEAKER. That is very often done.

Mr. CONGER. Objection was made. I do not recollect that the Chair decided the point, but it was admitted that the decision must be against the resolution, and the objection was withdrawn. That occurred in the Forty-third Congress, and the question was renewed in the Forty-fourth Congress, and the objection being again withdrawn the chairmen of the subcommittees were authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. POTTER. In those cases the resolutions did not declare that the subcommittees should be committees of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, but if the resolution may declare that somebody else than the regular committee shall be a committee of the House, whether it consist of one or a dozen, that is an open and palpable violation of the rules.

Mr. SAYLER. In our investigating committees of the last Congress each one was divided into three subcommittees and the chairman of each subcommittee administered oaths.

Mr. CONGER. That was by a resolution of the House, and no objection was made, but here objection is made.

Mr. SAYLER. Well, after the House has acted for a long series of years upon a proposition, and it has been consented to time and time again and acted upon time and again, and no question has ever been raised in regard to it, I undertake to say such practice becomes a part of the common law of the House, to which a mere factious objection cannot be opposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would not matter whether it was by a majority or a two-third vote, if in either case it was a violation of the law.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a precedent in my mind where, as I remember it, the House passed upon the question. During the proceedings in the case of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary administered oaths to certain witnesses, one of whom was a recusant witness and refused to answer. He was brought before the House and was ordered to answer, and was imprisoned until he did answer, although the oath administered to him was administered only by a chairman of a subcommittee. He was obliged to answer the question, as any other witness under oath. So that the House passed upon the question at that time. I happen to have it in memory, because I was the chairman of that subcommittee.

Mr. MORRISON. This authority was conferred upon the committee that investigated the Louisiana election, in the Forty-fourth Congress; the committee of which Mr. HOAR was chairman. The authority for chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths was conferred by virtue of a resolution drawn by Mr. HOAR, in the identical terms of this resolution. That precedent was followed also during the last Congress by a resolution authorizing chairmen of subcommittees of committees of investigation to administer oaths. Subcommittees were constituted by the chairmen of the several committees, and by the action of the House, under a resolution especially so providing, those subcommittees became committees of the House for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I think there are one or two cases where the courts have held that under our rules the administering of an oath by a person not authorized to do so by law, or by a resolution of the House which brought such persons within the law, would not permit the charge of perjury to lie against the person to whom such oath was administered. That is a material fact in such a case as this.

Mr. THOMPSON. Let the law be read.

Mr. CONGER. If it be that the administering of an oath by a person not authorized to administer it would relieve a witness of the charge of perjury, then we should see to it that that was not done.

The SPEAKER. It is nearly an every-day occurrence in this House for chairmen of subcommittees to administer oaths in the investigations ordered by this House.

Mr. CONGER. I do not deny that at all; I know the House has done it. But the House does it by making the chairmen of subcommittees equivalent to chairmen of committees, and authorizes them to administer oaths by a change of the rule. The point I make is that that is a change of the rules and requires a two-third vote. I do not deny the power of the House to do it by a change of the rules.

The SPEAKER. If it was a change of the rule and requiring a two-third vote, the gentleman could not stand upon it against the law any more than he could stand upon a mere majority vote against the law.

Mr. CONGER. You may change the rule so as to make the chairman of a subcommittee equivalent to the chairman of a committee, and thus bring him within the law; but the rule does not make him so, it is the law. That is the very point I make, that when you wish to make the chairman of a subcommittee come within the law as chairman of a committee you have to change the rule to do it, and that requires a two-third vote.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to say a few words on the point of order. Why is it that a committee cannot sit during a recess? Simply because the rule upon which a committee is constituted forbids it, and it is a rule which is as operative in this case as any other rule is operative to any case to which it may apply.

The rule is for the time being the law of the House. We call them "rules," but they are the law of the House so far as the House alone has power to make laws. If there were no provision in the rules themselves by which they could be suspended or rescinded, then under the law applicable to parliamentary proceedings a majority of the House could suspend a rule or abrogate it temporarily or absolutely. But the universal rule of parliamentary law is that where the rules prescribe the mode by which any rule may be modified, suspended, or repealed, that mode must be adopted, and the power to do it must be fully set forth.

In this case our rules provide that no committee shall sit during the recess. Another rule of the House provides two things to which I wish to call attention. One is that no standing rule of this House shall be changed or suspended unless one day's notice for that purpose be given, except on Mondays. The other is that no standing rule of the House can be suspended on Monday or on any other day when suspensions are in order, either directly or indirectly, except by a two-third vote; so the rule declares. Now to hold that a motion can be made to suspend indirectly a rule by a majority vote would be to hold that the rule which provides for suspension or other change has no existence or force.

Mr. SAYLER. What rule is suspended or changed in this case?

Mr. THOMPSON. Rule 72, on page 117.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman read Rule 72?

Mr. THOMPSON. "No committee shall sit during the session of the House without special leave."

Mr. SAYLER. What is the "special leave?"

Mr. THOMPSON. What is a "rule?"

Mr. SAYLER. The "special leave" to which the rule refers, of course, is simply this: No committee of this House shall of its own action, of its own accord and good will go out of this House during the session of the House for the purpose of sitting as a committee. But that rule also means that, if a majority of the House gives to the members of that committee special leave to sit during the sessions of the House, then they have that special leave, and that special leave is given by a majority of the House. Therefore, I ask the gentleman on the other side to say what rule is suspended in this case.

Mr. THOMPSON I say that Rule 72 is suspended and Rule 73 is suspended; not only suspended, but for the time being destroyed or disregarded.

Mr. SAYLER. Why, the rule itself provides that it may be suspended——

Mr. THOMPSON. How?

Mr. SAYLER. By special "leave of the House."

Mr. THOMPSON. The general rule is that no rule shall be suspended except by a two-third vote. A rule may be suspended or disregarded when no objection is made; but there is provision in your rules by which a rule cannot be suspended, disregarded, modified, or annulled by less than a two-third vote; otherwise your rules mean nothing.

Mr. SAYLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this point: he would be right if Rule 72 read in this way: "no committee shall sit during the sitting of the House." But, unfortunately for the gentleman's argument, these words are added: "Without special leave."

Mr. THOMPSON. Then my friend means to say that the phrase "special leave" destroys the effect of the provision of our rules that no rule shall be suspended or changed except by a two-third vote. Our rules have sought to keep us clear from the dilemma in which the gentleman wishes to place us; they have sought to prevent any interference with the rules except by a two-third vote. But the gentleman holds that the use of the phrase "without special leave" nullifies and abrogates the provision requiring a two-third vote for a suspension of any rule. I do not so believe.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman will allow me to say that there is no instance provided for in the rules in which a two-third vote is necessary for any purpose unless such a vote is expressly specified.

Mr. THOMPSON. I say that no rule of the House (and there is not a solitary exception) can be suspended for a moment without a two-third vote.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to say that while I accept distinctly what he now says, so far from seeking to change the provisions of any rule, and above all Rule 72 which he is citing, it is in order to comply with that rule that I have asked the leave of the House for which it provides.

Mr. THOMPSON. Now, I think there is another point of order. I think it is the right of any gentleman on this floor (and I give notice now that when the time comes I shall raise the question) to ask that the vote be divided, so as to submit first as a separate proposition the question, "Will the House supend the rules?" not "in order to adopt the resolution," but, Will the House suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing it to be voted on? I give notice now that if I should have the opportunity I will ask the Chair to present the motion to the House in that form, so as to have a distinct vote upon the question, Will the House suspend the rules?

I desire to make a remark upon another point. The gentleman says that this resolution is so adroitly drawn that if passed it will not violate any law. This is not a mere proposition to constitute a select committee of eleven men, the chairman of which shall, under the law and rules, have power to administer oaths so that a witness willfully testifying falsely would be guilty of perjury. This proposition goes further. It is not that this House shall constitute more than one committee, but that this committee, when appointed, may at its pleasure constitute eleven new committees, each one composed of a sing'le member, who shall be regarded as chairman, and that each of these chairmen, not in accordance with any rule or law but under the mere direction of this House, which has no legislative powers except for its own government, shall be authorized to administer oaths, and that witnesses thus sworn, if they testify falsely, shall be guilty of perjury. The law declares that only the Speaker of this House, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the chairmen of the special committees, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and the chairman of a standing committee shall have power to administer oaths. Under the law the chairman of a sub-committee cannot administer an oath any more than any private citizen in this land. False swearing under an oath administered by the chairman of a subcommittee would not be perjury, as the gentleman from Ohio surely knows. Yet here is proposed a drag-net examination; and oaths are to be administered by men who have no power to administer them, to men who will probably be willing under these circumstances, having before them no fear of the penalties of perjury, to testify unfairly and untruthfully. I repeat that this House cannot, by mere resolution, authorize any man to administer oaths the violation of which shall constitute perjury. That is a legislative power to be exercised by the three departments of our Government to which such power has been confided.

Mr. CASWELL. I do not think that Rule 72, to which my friend from Pennsylvania refers, has any application at all to this case.

The SPEAKER. None, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CASWELL. That rule prohibits committees from sitting during the sessions of the House, but not during the recess. The point which I suppose it would be proper to make is that when Congress adjourns, all its powers, whether in committees or otherwise, cease, except by the concurrence of the two Houses. Now, I call the attention of the Chair to the Manual, on page 91, which embodies precisely my idea:

> Committees may be appointed to sit during a recess by an adjournment but not by prorogation. Neither House can continue any portion of itself in any parliamentary function beyond the end of the session without the consent of the other two branches. When done it is by a bill constituting them commissioners for the particular purpose.

The SPEAKER. That is an instance in the British Parliament.

Mr. CASWELL. I make the point that when the Congress adjourns all the powers of the Congress cease, unless by concurrence of the two bodies, embraced in the form of a bill or joint resolution, committees shall be appointed to sit during the recess.

Mr. SAYLER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin to read the comment made on that rule of the British Parliament, which he will find on page 109 of the Digest, in which a distinction is drawn between the action of the House of Representatives directly and the British Parliament. He will find this section construed, in view of the distinction which exists between the sessions of Congress and the sessions of the British Parliament, and very properly, not to restrain the committees of the House with the leave of the House, sitting during the recess between the first and second sessions of a Congress. That distinction has frequently been drawn, and that is the only point involved here. The gentleman is perfectly correct as to the action of the British Parliament, and I have no doubt the gentleman would be perfectly correct if when we adjourn at the end of this session it was the final adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress. But, sir, that is not so, for when we adjourn at this session it will merely be a recess between the second and third sessions of the Forty-fifth Congress, expressly provided for and referred to in the Digest, accepted as the authority of the House, and committees may sit by leave of the House.

Mr. CASWELL. I refer to that authority as being analogous in reason to support the point I have made. It is also analogous to the proposition that one House cannot adjourn more than three days without the consent of the other body, and when both Houses resolved to adjourn upon a particular day it adjourns both Houses on that day, which could not be done by either House without the consent of the other, but must be done by the concurrence of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair considers this proposition is properly before the House and that it is competent for the House to instruct its committees as to how they shall proceed. If they have the authority to institute the procedure they have the right to instruct the committee as to the time and manner. The Chair thinks that ruling is sustained by the paragraph in the Manual that "select committees do not hold over to the second or subsequent session after their appointment, unless specially authorized to do so."

The Chair thinks this provision authorizes them specially to do so both as to manner and as to time, and the Chair therefore——

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will allow me a word.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a moment to state an example to the Speaker on this question of the right to sit during the recess and the right to sit at any time. On the 24th of April, 1876, a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from New Orleans, [Mr. GIBSON,] that a committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker, with instructions to make thorough examination into the conduct and management of the custom-house at the port of New Orleans, &c., with power to employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, to sit in New Orleans during the recess, and to report by bill or otherwise at any time. The Speaker will find that on page 857 of House Journal, first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, the yeas and nays were called and the resolution was declared not adopted because two-thirds had not voted in favor thereof.

Mr. COX, of New York. Was any question raised on the subject at the time?

The SPEAKER. That does not at all conflict with the position of the Chair that when a resolution is properly before the House it is competent for the House to instruct as to the time and manner of proceeding.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will allow me to read another illustration.

Mr. SAYLER. Was not the motion to which the gentleman from Ohio refers made under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, and it was considered necessary to suspend the rules in order to introduce a resolution.

Mr. SAYLER. And that was done on a Monday. It did not come before this House as a question of privilege, and in that regard is unlike this case, for this does come before the House as a question of privilege, and it has been decided that it is a question of privilege. The case to which the gentleman refers was a resolution sought to be introduced on Monday by a two-third vote suspending the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. If gentlemen will listen to me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen, if gentlemen do not.

Mr. GARFIELD. On January 22, 1877, a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] that the message of the President and the accompanying documents in answer to the resolution of the House calling for copies of all dispatches, orders, &c., relating to the use of troops in the States of Virginia, &c., be referred to a select committee of eleven members, with instructions, &c., and with the power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report at any time.

Mr. KASSON made the point of order that the resolution was not in order except upon a motion to suspend the rules.

The Speaker held that unanimous consent having been given to lay the said message before the House, the question of reference in the event of different committees being proposed was prescribed by Rule 43, and the resolution, so far as it created a select committee and conferred power to send for persons and papers, was in order.

Mr. BANKS made the point of order that that portion of the resolution giving the proposed committee the right to report at any time was not in order, as the order of business prescribed by the rules would thereby be changed, which could not now be done except by a suspension of the rules.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair would sustain the same point of order again.

Mr. GARFIELD. And Mr. WOOD modified his resolution by striking out that part "to report at any time."

The SPEAKER. It was because that changed the order of business in the House, giving that committee the power to report over any other committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. But that is in this resolution.

The SPEAKER. That point of order has not been raised.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raised that point of order, or gave notice that I would do so when I first addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had taken a note of the points of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GARFIELD. This was one of the points of order I made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to listen to all the points. He will take no advantage of gentlemen. The first point of the gentleman from Michigan was that the resolution gave to the select committee the unusual power of sitting during the recess. The Chair has overruled that point of order on the ground already stated.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow me to make a remark on the next point of order?

The SPEAKER. With pleasure. But if any gentleman has the statute the Chair would like to hear it read.

Mr. TIPTON. I had risen for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair to it. I have it here.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule, as stated by Barclay in his Digest, is not in conformity with the text of the Revised Statutes, section 101; and as some gentlemen may have been misled by the language of the law as printed in Barclay's Digest, I ask the Clerk to read section 101 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 101. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

Mr. SPRINGER. This section of the law as printed on page 327 of our Manual, being copied by our present journal clerk from Barclay's Digest, contains the word "standing" before the word "committee," so that it reads "or a chairman of any standing committee." That is not in accordance with the text of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Section 101 of the Revised Statutes says, "or of any committee."

Mr. CONGER. I would like to make a remark.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask the Clerk to read section 5392 relating to perjury.

The SPEAKER. That relates to a legal question, and the Chair does not decide legal questions any more than constitutional questions. But the Chair will listen.

Mr. CONGER. The statute prescribes who shall administer oaths. Now our rules prescribe the persons coming within the description of the statute. The statute says among other things the chairman of a committee of either House of Congress is empowered to administer oaths. Our rules declare who shall be chairman of committees. Rule 68 says:

The first-named member of any committee shall be the chairman—

So far that defines under the law who may administer oaths—and in his absence, or being excused by the House, the next-named member shall be chairman.

And so on as often as the case shall happen unless the committee by a majority of their number elect a chairman.

Now, we have, Mr. Speaker, a statute saying who in this regard may administer oaths. It shall be the chairman of a committee. Our rules define who shall be that chairman. He shall be the first person named upon the committee, and in his absence the next in order named upon that committee, and so on successively, unless the committee shall elect its chairman, and then he shall be the person authorized to administer oaths.

Now, the point I make is that this House cannot by a rule make the person contemplated in the statute the chairman of a committee, different from our rules, as the chairman of a subcommittee; or there may be a subcommittee of one, and under this resolution there is an attempt to make that one the chairman of a committee or the chairman of himself. I refer to it in that way to show the utter absurdity of a proposition that the chairman of a subcommittee shall be considered as coming within the statute.

Now, the gentleman will say that this resolution makes more committees, that is, that it makes subcommittees committees of this House. That is what the resolution undertakes to do. The resolution undertakes to make subcommittees committees of this House in order that their chairmen may be legally authorized under the laws of the land to administer oaths. Sir, if there be any sanctity about an oath, if there be any penalty for violation of an oath, certainly this House should of all others desire that the person authorized to administer the oath upon which perjury can be based should be a known officer of the law, recognized for that purpose. And I submit that this is giving a power which this House cannot give by a majority vote. It cannot change that rule, no matter what comes before the House for consideration.

And I submit to the Chair that that remark which has been quite common lately and which seemed to the Chair in the cases cited sufficient—that when a matter may be considered or a thing may be done, there seems to be conveyed a power to do it in this way or the other—it seems to me that embodies a principle which ought to be guarded by the Chair very carefully, and confined at least to the case in which no doubt can arise in the mind of the Chair as to the power following with the consideration.

Now, I think that this very power to give to the chairman of a subcommittee authority to administer oaths has been asked in this House on several occasions by resolution and by request, and that it has been granted without the point being raised, and that when the point was raised on one or two former occasions within my recollection, especially in the case referred to of the Louisiana committee, and in a case in regard to the Vicksburgh committee in the Forty-third Congress, the objection was withdrawn, else the Chair would not have entertained the proposition except under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. POTTER. Upon the question of order now raised let me suggest that the gentleman from Michigan must be exceedingly apprehensive of the examination proposed to raise an objection to the method of swearing witnesses that has been so long and so uniformly practiced by the committees of the House. As to the merits of the objection the law authorizes the President, the Speaker, and the chairmen of committees to swear any person as to any matter under their examination. Now I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that the statute does not say that nobody else shall swear witnesses. His construction of this section would exclude the Chief-Justice of the United States and every legal officer of the Government. Under his construction of the law, Mr. Speaker, you could find no one on the face of the earth who could in an investigation like the one proposed administer an oath in the absence of the chairman of the committee and this would result in neutralizing the action of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman care whether the witnesses are legally sworn or does he not care?

Mr. POTTER. I shall take care, if I have anything to do with the matter, to have them legally sworn and any relief the gentleman from Michigan expects to gain from my remissness in that regard he will be welcome to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the objection of the gentleman from Michigan, which is a technical one, is calculated to cripple the House in its wish to investigate. A close examination of the statute would seem to give authority to any committee of this House to administer oaths and the terms of the resolution authorize the appointment of subcommittees in the manner provided by the resolution. If the House should authorize the appointment of subcommittees they would have the power to administer oaths under the very words of the statute.

Mr. POTTER. And the words of the resolution as well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order, and will now hear the next point of order made.

Mr. CONGER. The next is the one made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition as he understands it, and if he does not state it accurately the gentleman from Ohio can correct him. The gentleman from Ohio raised the point that this resolution provides for a change of the rules of the House, and gives the committee the right to report at any time, in contravention of the rules of the House, which provide that the committees shall report in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. POTTER. I did not know that the point had been made by the gentleman from Ohio until now, and I ask leave to withdraw the words "with leave to report at any time."

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear this point raised when he was taking notes of the points of order that were raised. He only took down those made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. SAYLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask for information, whether, the subject-matter here having been decided to be privileged, under that privilege, without any specification of the kind in the resolution, the committee would not have the power to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will reserve that point; it will come up whenever the committee wish to report; but the Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SAYLER. I concur entirely with that decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. Are we to understand that if the report of a committee should contain privileged matter the committee could report at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine that point and decide it when the committee is ready to report, if it should be.

Mr. POTTER. The Chair understands that I have stricken out the words "with leave to report at any time."

Mr. HALE. I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution before the gentleman calls the previous question, and I presume there will be no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. One point has not been ruled upon, and that is that the resolution involves an expenditure of money and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it does not on its face involve an expenditure of money; but if it did it would only involve an expenditure out of the contingent fund of the House and would not therefore be subject to a point of order according to practice.

Mr. POTTER. The various points of order raised to the reception of this resolution having been disposed of, I desire to make only one remark, and that because of something personal said by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] before I shall ask the House whether it desires to close discussion on this resolution or not by the previous question.

The gentleman from Michigan intimated that it was an impertinence on my part to introduce this resolution. Mr. Speaker, very few gentlemen of the House, I think, would assume the responsibility of introducing a resolution of the character and magnitude of the resolution I have offered without being requested to do so. I introduced it upon the request of my political associates in this House made to me this morning, gentlemen whose request I did not feel at liberty to refuse. I think few gentlemen on this side of the House when so requested would have felt themselves at liberty to refuse to propose the resolution in question.

I want to add also, in view of something that was said by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] and by gentlemen on the other side, that the resolution contemplates nothing but an inquiry into the facts connected with the electoral vote of the States of Florida and Louisiana, and into the participation of officers of the Government in connection with the alleged frauds there. What can be done after the inquiry is completed, what ought to be done, should be determined only after the inquiry has been concluded. For myself, I have no purpose in this respect, and I know of none on the part of my political associates.

I desire to add further that I have no wish to disturb the peace and quiet of the country and that prosperity which I hope is now beginning to revive, and that I have no fear that the investigation proposed can result in disturbing it. The Government of this country was made by the people and they are competent to preserve it without violence and to right peaceably the wrongs that should be righted or, if need be, to submit for a season to wrong if the public interests demand that they should submit to it. But I repeat what I said before, that to refuse to inquire into successful frauds is to invite their repetition, and is in the end to jeopard, not to secure, the public safety.

And now as the subject-matter of this resolution is familiar to all the members of the House, I will call the previous question upon it and let the House determine whether it shall be further debated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 251) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3121) for the relief of Numis H. Coverdale.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 2132) to pay for clerical services and extraordinary expenses, under the seventh section of the act of August 18, 1856, in the Pawnee land district in Kansas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4425) to alter and amend a law of the District of Columbia relative to the inspection of flour.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 766) to legalize certain patents issued to members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians; and

A bill (S. No. 989) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the preamble and resolution of Mr. POTTER, upon which he had called the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I have an amendment clearly germane to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] It is an amendment which the gentleman will see should be permitted in fairness to be offered. Considering the magnitude of the subject, which has been well referred and acknowledged by the gentleman, I hope that he will not seek here and now to stifle further debate, to allow no opportunity to answer what has been said, and to give no permission to this side to offer an amendment to his resolution, so that the investigation which his committee shall make shall be the more exhaustive and searching. I ask him to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. POTTER. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to stifling debate, I beg to remind him that whatever debate has been had upon the merits of this matter has been under cover of points of order and by gentlemen opposed to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. There has not been any debate whatever on the merits of the resolution.

Mr. POTTER. As to the amendment, I will yield to the gentleman to state the nature of it. It may be that in the form of an amendment he has some speech.

Mr. HALE. The better way would be to have the amendment read.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman is exceedingly familiar with parliamentary law, and is able to state the nature of his amendment so as to advise me what it is, and then I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. Then I will read the amendment. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the democratic side."]

Mr. POTTER. I do not ask the gentleman to do that. The gentleman is perfectly aware of what the parliamentary courtesy I offer him amounts to, and I ask him to state the nature of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I will state further, and I think it is permissible for me to be allowed to do so, that this matter has not come up here suddenly. It has been considered a long time by the gentleman and his associates, but it was never known to us when it would be sprung upon the House. Feeling that it was of course becoming a party matter, I consulted the Speaker of the House, who I am glad to say in these matters is always ready to give the minority a chance to be heard. I received from the Speaker the assurance that this side of the House should be represented in this matter and should have an opportunity of putting in its proposition.

Now, all that will result from the gentleman's yielding to my courteous request to allow my amendment to come in is the opportunity to vote upon it. He and his associates may vote it down, if they will, and then they may vote upon their own proposition.

He will see that my amendment is germane, is in the direction of investigation; that, so far from narrowing or stifling it in the least degree, it sends to this select committee to be appointed for a purpose subject-matters connected only with the subject-matter of his original resolution, and it departs not an iota from the character of the subject-matter of his resolution, that is, the investigation of the circumstances and facts of alleged frauds attendant upon the presidential election of 1876.

I now ask him, as he seeks full investigation, that he may not here, by the power which he has in the management of this resolution and representing the majority, seek to throttle the rights of this side of the House, and to refuse me what I have never known to be before refused, the opportunity of offering an amendment in the direction in which his original resolution runs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say in corroboration of the statement of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that he did state to that gentleman this: that if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] desired to submit an amendment he would be recognized by the Chair for that purpose if the gentleman who was in charge of the proposed resolution (which was then the subject of discussion between the gentleman from Maine and the Chair) gave him the opportunity to do so. And then the gentleman from Maine asked whether an amendment germane to the subject-matter of the resolution was not as much a question of privilege on the one side as on the other. The Chair told him, that if he was refused an opportunity to offer the amendment to the original resolution, then it would be competent for the gentleman himself as a question of privilege, if it was determined to be a question of privilege, to offer the proposition in his own right.

Mr. HALE. I admit clearly the trouble now is not with the Chair, but with the gentlemen representing the majority on the other side. My amendment is here and I desire to offer it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will see at once that a proposition which is a privileged question in one particular would seem to run with equal privilege in other particulars, if germane.

Mr. POTTER. I accept all the responsibility which belongs to me, but the determination of whether the gentleman's amendment shall come in if I do not yield for it now will not rest with me; it will rest with the House of Representatives. If the House wants it, they will vote down the previous question. Now the gentleman has made no answer to my request as to the subject-matter of his amendment, except to say that it relates to the general subject of the alleged presidential frauds.

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. HALE.) Read it.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman let it be read? I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read for information. [Cries of "No!" "no!" on the democratic side.] If the gentleman seeks information, it lies in these pages, [holding up manuscript.]

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Maine knows that he could answer if he chose; if he refuses to answer and insists on giving me an answer in a quire of foolscap, I say that is not such an appeal to my courtesy as I ought to yield to. He refuses to tell me that his amendment is germane to the inquiry into the States of Florida and Louisiana, to which alone this resolution relates. For aught I know it may relate to inquiries in other States.

Mr. HALE. Then the gentleman seeks to limit the inquiry to selected States, and does not desire to let us go outside?

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman for that reply. I answer just as frankly——

Mr. HALE. I tell the gentleman plainly that my amendment is not confined to the States of Florida and Louisiana.

Mr. POTTER. Now I have got at last the answer I have been asking for. I reply that I decline to yield; for if in Florida or Louisiana frauds were attempted they became operative. If the gentleman will tell me that he proposes to show that there were frauds in South Carolina, by which the electoral vote of that State was counted for Hayes when it ought to have been counted for Tilden, then I shall be prepared to permit an amendment of that sort, for that will be germane. But the gentleman does not venture to declare; he will not declare anything of the sort.

Mr. HALE. In other words, frauds which apply only to one side are to be examined into here, and the gentleman seeks to exclude an inquiry into the frauds committed at the hands of his own party. Is that it? [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. POTTER. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker. The room for inquiry into wrong and moral obliquity in this world is very wide. If the gentleman wants to inquire into what some person has attempted to do which ought not to be done, and which that person failed to accomplish, let him introduce his resolution, put himself at the head of the committee, and go into the investigation. I shall not object. [Applause on the democratic side.] I am not aiming at persons. I only desire to ascertain whether a fraud in the electoral vote of these two States was successfully perpetrated, and, if so, how it was perpetrated, in order that hereafter such frauds may be prevented. The inquiry is not who has done wrong, not who has been wicked elsewhere in the country, but what fraud in the electoral vote was accomplished.

Mr. HALE. Then the gentleman denies every attempt at investigation where clearly shown frauds, the boldest and worst in American history, are at the skirts of his own party in half a dozen other States.

Mr. POTTER. No, sir; I will vote for any kind of investigation which the gentleman may propose as an independent proposition; but I will not admit an amendment clearly and obviously not germane and intended to embarrass the investigation proposed.

Mr. HALE. Why should not this matter be referred to the committee of which the gentleman is to be chairman? I do not ask a committee a majority of whose members shall belong to this side of the House; but I ask that this inquiry be sweeping, as the country will demand that it shall be, and I am willing that the gentleman's committee shall make it.

Mr. POTTER. Well, let the gentleman from Maine "sweep" up any dirt he pleases. [Laughter.] That is not the purpose of the investigation I desire.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from New York evidently does not mean to "sweep."

Mr. POTTER. No, not with such an impracticable broom as the gentleman from Maine would give me.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

Mr. POTTER. Oh, yes. I yield to any one of the "visiting statesmen."

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the gentleman from New York to say, when he was first up, that he was not discussing——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio for a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If these impatient statesmen will wait a moment, they will be relieved of me; but they cannot roar me down by noise. [Cries of "good!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no attempt of that sort.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would seem that many members on the other side are undertaking it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect the gentleman in his rights.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the gentleman from New York, when he first arose, to say that he was not seeking to investigate the presidential title, but to investigate the question of frauds in the presidential election. Now, if that be so, I cannot understand the gentleman's present position—that he will not consent to investigate any alleged fraud in any State unless the vote of that State was necessary to put the Presidency where it went; for only in such a case, he says, would the vote, affect the result. He asked my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] whether his amendment related to any State the vote of which was necessary to put the presidential title where it now is. Now, the gentleman from New York utterly changes his first position to one of seeking to get at the presidential title. If he is seeking merely to investigate frauds in the presidential election, then I believe he will get the unanimous vote of this House for his resolution; provided he will enlarge it so as to include all other cases where there is any bona fide allegation, believed in by a large body of people, of fraud and these allegations of fraud, every way as well grounded as any that he believes in with regard to these two States. If he will enlarge his resolution in that way, he shall have my vote, and I believe he will have the vote of every man on this side of the House.

Mr. CONGER and others. Every man.

Mr. GARFIELD. But if he elects a partial and narrow limit of alleged fraud which, in case it is proved, can conduce only to the political advantage of one party and not to the general advantage of truth and public justice, he will have all the opposition that all honorable men can offer to such a narrow, partial, partisan, unjust investigation. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Ohio asked me to yield to him for a question. It was a very long question and I shall answer it in a much shorter time than he asked it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says I have changed my ground and that I want to attack the presidential title. Not at all. Whatever, if anything, may happen to the presidential title as a result of this inquiry does not concern me now. I have no purpose of disturbing it. That I have said before and repeat.

The gentleman further says then if I only want to investigate election frauds his side of the House would be glad to go into an investigation so sweeping and general as the one he refers to. Sir, such an investigation would never come to any termination whatever. Perhaps that is why that side of the House seeks it. But there is between the two extremes this obvious distinction: I seek to investigate not with a view to disturb the presidential title; not with a view of injuring anybody's character; I seek to investigate frauds which became operative, which were not only attempted but which were carried out, and which have been brought to our notice by the complaint of a sovereign State of this Union. There are but two States in which that occurred and no more. Therefore any investigation looking beyond those is not germane, and if there is no political effect to be gained by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber by an investigation of the frauds in the States of Louisiana and Florida, it is because they got the political effect of such frauds on the 6th of December, 1876, when their electoral votes were unjustly recorded for the present incumbent of the executive office.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BEEBE. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say the gentleman from New York——

Mr. POTTER. What does the gentleman ask now?

Mr. CONGER. If he will not permit this side of the House to take any part in framing this resolution, we will let him go through with his own party if he can.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Michigan is kind, but we can do that without his permission. If he will bring in the resolution for investigation into the frauds he speaks of we will be more liberal; in that event he may count upon votes on this side of the House to adopt it.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say on this matter that I made the proposition in good faith. Gentlemen on the other side have denied it. Now let them go on by themselves.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman has demanded the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Let them go on by themselves.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I understood the regular order was demanded.

Mr. MAYHAM. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. In a matter like this the Chair desires to accommodate himself to any reasonable expression desired by the one or the other side of the House. The attention of the Chair, however, having been called to the fact that the previous question has been demanded, must comply with the rules of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a single question. Will he yield for that purpose?

Mr. POTTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman let me put in the words "South Carolina" after Louisiana?

Mr. GARFIELD. And Mississippi.

Mr. POTTER. No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield for that purpose, and for the same reason, there was no fraud which became operative in South Carolina.

Mr. MAYHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether after the previous question has been demanded any debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, under a close construction of the rules.

Mr. COX, of New York. How, then, does the gentleman yield to gentlemen on the other side of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did yield, and the Chair permitted it.

Mr. COX, of New York. But he would not permit gentlemen on this side of the House to be heard.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object to all further yielding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] was speaking for gentlemen on this side.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Let the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question, and let both sides of the House have the same chance.

Mr. HALE. I demand a division on the seconding of the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes none.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted,

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 115.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen are requested to vote, or the House will find itself without a quorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I should like to know what has paralyzed the limbs of gentlemen on the other side that they do not vote. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The negative vote has not yet been reported.

Mr. HALE. There are none voting in the negative.

Mr. POTTER. I report the gentleman from Maine who acted as one of the tellers as the only one who voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report—ayes 115, noes 1.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Where is the gentleman from Maine? He was one of the tellers.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order to show there is a quorum present I now move there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich,	Douglas,	Knott,	Roberts,
Bagley,	Ewing,	Landers,	Robinson, M. S.
Baker, William H.	Freeman,	Lindsey,	Stephens,
Ballou,	Frye,	Loring,	Swann,
Banks,	Fuller,	Maish,	Townsend, M. I.
Bisbee,	Goode,	Money,	Veeder,
Brogden,	Hanna,	Morse,	Waddell,
Cabell,	Harris, Benj. W.	Overton,	Walker,
Carlisle,	Harris, John T.	Powers,	Warner,
Chittenden,	Hart,	Quinn,	Willits.
Clarke of Kentucky,	Hunton,	Rice, Americus V.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. VANCE.) The Chair will cause Rule 36 to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

36. Upon the call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted, after which the names of the absentees shall again be called over, the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.—November 13, 1789, and December 14, 1795.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the roll-call does not disclose the presence of a quorum? If that be so, I believe it is unnecessary to have any further proceedings under the call.

Mr. SAYLER. There may be further proceedings under the call, whether a quorum is present or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire to announce that my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ALDRICH, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. That announcement is not now in order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, it was agreed to; and further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to be informed by the Chair whether, if the House should now adjourn, the consideration of this resolution would come up as unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. Oh, let us go on and finish this to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York inquires whether, if the House should now adjourn, the consideration of this resolution will come up as unfinished business. The Chair is of opinion it would. The Chair thinks in addition it would retain its rank and character as a question of privilege until disposed of.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says: "Go on and finish this." Gentlemen on that side have been attempting to prevent our finishing it.

Mr. HALE. You have shown you cannot finish it.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentlemen on that side have shown they do not wish to finish it. We will have a quorum of democrats here, and then we will finish it.

Mr. FORT. If the gentlemen on the other side want a caucus, we will accommodate them and adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER. I think we are competent to run our side of the House without the assistance of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAYES. I wish to know if gentlemen on the democratic side have so quickly discovered a blunder?

Mr. FORT. I would like the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to state what is his object in moving to adjourn. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. HALE and Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 110, not voting 63; as follows:

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. SARGENT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR JOSEPH HENRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has the painful duty of laying before the Senate the following announcement of the death of Professor Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, by Chief-Justice Waite, chancellor of that institution, which the Secretary of the Senate will now read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, May 14, 1878.

SIR: I am requested by the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to inform you, and through you the Senate of the United States, of the death of Professor Joseph Henry, the Secretary and director of the institution, which occurred in this city on Monday, May 13, at 12.10 p. m. His funeral will take place at the New York Avenue Presbyterian church on Thursday, May 16, at half past four o'clock in the afternoon, and the Senate is respectfully invited to attend.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. R. WAITE,
Chancellor of the Institution.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,
Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives, concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses at four o'clock on Thursday, the 16th instant for the purpose of enabling Senators and Representatives to attend the funeral of the late Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to unanimously.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. No. 775) for the restoration to market of certain lands in the Territory of Utah;

A bill (H. R. No. 3369) to provide for the publication of notices of contest under the homestead, pre-emption, and tree-culture laws of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term, for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant, of the patent of Thomas A. Weston—to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (H. R. No. 2138) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mary Fearon and Jessie Crossin, executrices of Samuel P. Fearon, deceased, for certain registered United States bonds redeemed by the Government on forged assignments and power of attorney—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 2139) making an appropriation for the payment to Richard Heater, executor of John Heater, deceased, late of Loudoun County, Virginia, of the sum therein named for value of the stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 4327) for the relief of certain laborers employed upon the Government works—to the Committee on Commerce.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 179) giving the consent of the Congress of the United States to the Legislature of the State of Nebraska to cede and transfer certain territory now under the jurisdiction of the State of Nebraska to the State of Missouri, the Legislature of Missouri consenting thereto—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TIMBER LANDS ON PACIFIC SLOPE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory; which were read.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, in line 2 of section 1, after the word "Oregon," to insert the words "and Nevada," and to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada and in Washington Territory."

Mr. SARGENT. The only question presented by the amendments of the House is whether the bill shall be extended to the State of Nevada, and there is no question that it ought to be. The Representative from that State moved in the House that that State be inserted. That is the only change. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were concurred in.

TIMBER IN COLORADO AND TERRITORIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 20) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes; which were read.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, after the word "protection," in line 13, to insert the words "of the timber and," and at the end of line 14 to add "and for other purposes: provided the provisions of this act shall not extend to railroad corporations."

Mr. TELLER. The amendments are satisfactory. I move that they be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a statement of the amount of work executed at the south pass of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON DISTRICT CHURCH PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, letters from the attorney and collector of the District of Columbia, and an exhibit showing the church property in default for taxes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of J. M. D. Ball and others, railway post-office clerks, route agents, and mail route messengers of the seventh division, United States railway mail service, praying for an increase of compensation and for the organization of the employés of the railway mail service into one body with numerical grades; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Mackellar, Smiths & Jordan, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and 133 others, manufacturers of and dealers in type material, praying that the bill to refund the sum of $3,183 to Miller & Richards, which was imposed upon them as a fine for undervaluation, may not pass; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY presented a resolution of Potomac Council No. 8, of the District of Columbia, Sovereigns of Industry, representing fifty families in the District, in favor of the enactment of such a law as will insure full weight to purchasers of coal and compel coal-dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of Joseph M. Wilson, of Washington City, District of Columbia, praying that a portion of the amount received from the sale of public lands be appropriated for the encouragement and support of industrial education in the public schools of our country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT. I present two petitions, one of them numerously signed, praying that a duty of thirty cents per pound be levied on all stereotype and electrotype plates imported into the United States. These petitions are signed by printers and publishers of California, and they give the reasons for their prayer. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I have a petition that may have been presented before by some other Senator, but I am not aware of that fact, and therefore present it now. It is the petition of numerous citizens of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis, praying that permission may be given to any and all persons without preference to land telegraphic cables on the shores of the United States. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1371) for the relief of John W. Skiles, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

HEAD-STONES FOR SOLDIERS' GRAVES.

Mr. PLUMB. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1060) directing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers interred at the cemetery at Mound City, Kansas, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and, as the bill is short and the matter has been heretofore under consideration, I ask for the present consideration of the bill. I will state in brief that the act of March 3, 1873, provides for the erection of head-stones over the graves of Union soldiers in the national cemeteries; but, according to the report of the Quartermaster-General, there are about seventeen thousand Union soldiers buried in private, village, or city cemeteries throughout the United States. His statement is also that the head-boards and all evidences of identity are fast disappearing, and that it is essential that immediate action should be taken if it is to be taken at all to provide for the erection of head-stones over these graves also. The act of March 3, 1873, provides for the appropriation of $1,000,000 for that purpose, a very large sum of which, $300,000 perhaps, still remains unexpended. The Pennsylvania General Assembly has memorialized Congress upon this subject, and at various times it has been called to the attention of Congress by the War Department. By reason of this fact, and as the session is now drawing to a close, I ask that the bill be considered at this time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Kansas if the bill is not just reported this morning?

Mr. PLUMB. It is.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will not the Senator let it lie over one day?

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator desires.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it will lead to discussion. The subject was discussed considerably at the last session and I am afraid it will lead to considerable discussion this morning. Therefore I ask that it go over.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think the bill can lead to any discussion whatever, but at the same time if any Senator thinks it will I am willing that it should lie over until to-morrow, with the notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the bill goes over.

Mr. MITCHELL subsequently said: The bill reported by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] the present consideration of which he asked for, is an entirely different bill from what I supposed it was, and I withdraw my objection to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon withdraws his objection, and the Senator from Kansas asks for the present consideration of the bill. The bill will be read for information subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 1060), directing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers interred in the cemetery at Mound City, Kansas.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, which was read, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers who served in the regular or volunteer Army of the United States during the war for the Union and who have been buried in private, village, or city cemeteries, in the same manner as provided by the law of March 3, 1873, for those interred in national military cemeteries. And for this purpose, and for the expenses incident to such work, so much of the appropriation of $1,000,000, made in the act above mentioned, as has not been expended and as may be necessary, is hereby made available.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from Kansas what amount of this appropriation is now unexpended?

Mr. PLUMB. About $300,000. The price paid for head-stones under the contracts for these stones which were required in the military cemeteries was $3.39, which is the estimate of the Quartermaster-General of the cost for erecting those provided for by this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have not in my mind definitely what it was, but I recollect that there was some report, to use a common expression, about a job in that contract, and a very large one, and it was said the expenditure ought not to have been placed in that form. I do not know the particulars of it. I ask the Senator whether there is a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. PLUMB. There is a brief report and a letter from the Quartermaster-General, which is embodied in the report. I ask the Clerk to read the letter.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let the report and letter be read.

Mr. PLUMB. The letter covers the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill 1060, directing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers interred in the cemetery at Mound City, Kansas.

There are, it is estimated, seventeen thousand Union dead interred in soldiers' lots in village and private cemeteries throughout the United States. If one of these soldiers' lots is furnished with head-stones, all should be; otherwise it will add to the discontent already existing in regard to this matter, as evidenced by the recent resolution of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania in reference to the soldiers' lot at Harrisburgh, copy of which was transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary on the 1st ultimo.

There are but thirty soldiers' graves in the Mound City cemetery. The bill requires the head-stones to be erected "in the same manner as provided by the law of March 3, 1873, for those interred in national military cemeteries," that is, by contract; and under that law it would first be necessary to advertise for proposals in ten newspapers of general circulation for sixty days.

If it is the intention, as is presumed, and as has been frequently recommended, to furnish head-stones for all these soldiers' lots, it can only be done at a reasonable cost by providing for the entire work at the same time. To do it in small lots will make it a very expensive undertaking. The cost of a separate advertisement for the thirty head-stones provided for in this bill is estimated at $840. The cost of the stones at the rate paid under the contract recently fulfilled ($3.39 each) would be $101.70, but in small lots the price would doubtless be much higher.

This subject requires early attention. The old head-boards first erected are rapidly decaying, and unless they are soon replaced by permanent and durable gravemarks, the identity of the graves must be lost.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

To the honorable SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to have the bill read again. It is very short.

The Chief Clerk again read the substitute proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. Is that bill reported from any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. Has it been printed?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was reported this morning.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to its present consideration if it was reported this morning. I do not know that I have objection to the bill particularly; but I want to examine it. I think it would be a very large permanent expense to the Government of the United States and perhaps a useless one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The report and bill will be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both will be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall call up the bill to-morrow morning.

STATUE OF ST. GEORGE AND THE DRAGON.

Mr. BAYARD. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report favorably the joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Society of the Sons of St. George, established at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,440.25 in gold, being the amount paid by said society upon a colossal statue of St. George and the Dragon. As the resolution is unobjectionable and will take but a moment, I ask for its present consideration, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1243) for the relief of Somerville Nicholson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1244) for the relief of George Williams, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1245) for the relief of William H. Davis, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1246,) requiring the examination or survey and estimate of cost of improving the entrance of Coos Bay and the mouth of Coquille River in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1247) for the relief of Mrs. E. H. Powers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FRANK A. PAGE.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 664) for the relief of Frank A. Page, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4235) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

WILLIAM NESSLE.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The bill (S. No. 482) for the relief of William Nessle was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims a day or two ago without any observation on my part, and was then indefinitely postponed. I move to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill, in order to restore it to the Calendar.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is restored to the Calendar by order of the Senate.

THOMAS BUROUGHS.

Mr. VOORHEES. Some days ago I made a report to the Senate from the Committee on Pensions on the bill (H. R. No. 2711) granting a pension to Thomas Buroughs, late a private in Company G, First Vermont Cavalry Regiment, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to. From information which I have since received I am induced to ask a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, for further examination.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, if there be no objection.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire the Senate to take notice that on Tuesday of next week I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 942, known as the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, in order that it may be considered.

SURVEY OF CATTARAUGUS RESERVATION.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. No. 3824) to authorize the survey of the Cattaraugus Indian reservation in the State of New York, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It simply authorizes these Indians to have their land surveyed at their own expense, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and it will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause the Cattaraugus Indian reservation in the State of New York to be resurveyed in accordance with the original survey thereof, and the exterior boundaries thereof to be marked by stone or iron monuments, the expense not to exceed $2,000 and to be paid by the Seneca Nation of Indians, who are authorized to select a surveyor, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate again proceed to the consideration of the bill which was up yesterday morning—Senate bill No. 306.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Railroads reported an amendment to strike out after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend by striking out, so as to conform to legislation heretofore, in section 14, lines 3 and 4, the words "having due regard for the rights of the company."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also move, in section 11, line 13, after the word "homesteads" to insert "by extending their claims to contiguous lands."

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask what bill this is.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senate bill No. 306.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the title of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. A bill amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon."

Mr. MERRIMON. Is there any written report accompanying the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a printed report. I can state in a word what the bill is. On the 4th of May, 1870, Congress passed an act making a donation of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland, Oregon, to Astoria, Oregon, with a branch from a suitable point of junction at or near Forest Grove to the Yamhill River, at or near McMinnville. The company proceeded to the construction of the road under the act, completed it to "a suitable point of junction," and also completed the branch to Yamhill River. It is twenty miles to the "suitable point of junction." That portion was accepted by the Government on the 16th of February, 1872. Twenty-seven and a half miles of the branch were completed and accepted by the Government June 23, 1876. The remaining portion of the road that is not completed is from the "suitable point of junction" to Astoria, a distance of ninety miles. That remains uncompleted; and the object of this bill is to extend the time to enable the company to complete that road. It makes no new grant, but is simply an extension of time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Did I understand the Senator to say that the road was within the State of Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. Exclusively.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then what has the State of Oregon to say about it; and what have we to do with granting a charter in the State of Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will have to ask the Congress of 1870 that question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But we are acting upon it to-day; and I ask the Senator in earnest what has Congress to do with a railroad entirely within the State of Oregon from beginning to end?

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose Congress has the right to aid any internal improvements in this country anywhere, whether in a State or not in a State, if the effect is to aid and develop the commerce of the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then, with this exception probably, Congress has never aided a railroad entirely within one State?

Mr. MITCHELL. On the contrary, I think it has done so quite frequently. I know there have been innumerable grants to wagon roads made exclusively within a State, and the principle is entirely the same.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand it as to Territories very well; but I do not recollect where it has been done as to States.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are several instances in my own State with regard to wagon roads.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I cannot well support such a bill where the entire line of road is within a State. It is my impression that Congress has very little or nothing to do with railroads belonging to a State entirely. There might be a difference, and there would be a difference, if the railroad traversed several States, or if the road was from a Territory to a State or from one State to another State. I know nothing of the provisions of this bill; I have not heard it read. It was read yesterday morning, I am told. I think it ought to be carefully considered before it is passed, and I think probably it ought to be read again. But the Senator has stated that there is a report, and that probably explains the whole of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that this bill has been on the Calendar over a month and has been read twice. It was read once before and was read again yesterday. I suggest to the honorable Senator that it is my impression, and that is the suggestion made to me by Senators on both sides of me, that the first grant ever made in aid of any railroad was in aid of one exclusively within the State of Illinois. Certainly our records are full of instances where grants have been made by Congress in aid of internal improvements wholly within a State. I do not think there is anything in that objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether this road runs down near the Columbia River, or how far from the river this road runs.

Mr. MITCHELL. As a rule it will be an average of forty or fifty miles from the river. There is a range of mountains, I will say to the Senator from Delaware, as he probably observed when he was out there last year, that separates the river from the great valley which will be penetrated by this road.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is this company chartered by the State of Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. The company is organized under the general incorporation laws of the State of Oregon, and after its organization Congress made this grant on the 4th of May, 1870, to this company.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suppose all that Congress did was simply to grant a land subsidy.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was all. It incorporated no company; it simply granted the aid, and did not attempt to incorporate the company. Perhaps that was the point on which my friend from West Virginia based his objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is there any provision in the act that this road shall be used for military and postal purposes?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly it provides for all that. I do not think there can be any objection to this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator now states what relieves the difficulty in part in my mind. I had understood from him that in 1870 or 1872 Congress had chartered this road.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now I understand that it is a road chartered by the State, and Congress granted aid to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire whether this road belongs to a corporation, a company of individuals exclusively, or whether the State has taken any special interest in the road.

Mr. MITCHELL. The State has nothing to do with it whatever. It is a private corporation, organized under the general incorporation law of the State of Oregon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then this is a proposition to extend a land grant which was formerly granted to a corporation of individuals within the limits of the State of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is to extend the time; that is all. The original grant was made to this corporation organized under the laws of Oregon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a very kindly feeling for the people of Oregon and I know something of the necessities under which they labor for railroad communication; but it seems to me the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to pause and hesitate before it gives away the public domain of this country, which belongs to the people of the whole country, to private individuals in any State or in any Territory. Perhaps there might have been some reason for a grant of the public domain to aid and assist the railroads which connect the eastern portion of the country with the Pacific coast; but this is a distinct and different measure. Here is a corporation existing within the limits of one State, exclusively composed of private individuals who have gone into the measure I suppose as a matter of private enterprise; and the proposition now is, after they have forfeited the privileges granted to them heretofore, to come in and have them extended again.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator that there is a very serious question in my mind whether there has been really any forfeiture. One construction would make the time expire some two years ago, and another construction, which I think is equally reasonable, would not make it expire until the 4th of the present month. It has expired under any construction on the 4th of this month, it is true.

I will suggest now to my honorable friend from Delaware that the grant in favor of the overland road to the Central Pacific Railroad Company was made to a company that was organized under the laws of a State, operating exclusively under those laws. The Central Pacific Railroad Company was not incorporated or organized by an act of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That company was authorized to extend its road into the Territories of the United States through the public lands of the United States. It was a distinct and different measure from that which the Senator from Oregon has under consideration. I commend very much the zeal of the Senator from Oregon in behalf of the interests of the people of his State. He has already pressed upon the attention of the Senate the claim of the Northern Pacific Railroad so far as it is connected with Oregon, and I believe he has also a bill to connect the Columbia River with the Central Pacific near Salt Lake.

Mr. MITCHELL. My friend from Delaware, I hope, will agree that that road ought to be encouraged and built.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am satisfied the people of Oregon need communication with the East; but I do not know that it is calculated to promote their interests to press many measures of this kind upon the attention of Congress at once and to provide subsidies and land grants for all of these railroads.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only press one at a time. I do not think there is any further objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon an amendment on line 20 of section 6. It now reads:

> The second shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury who shall thereupon pay to the corporation the sum or sums of money in such abstract stated as aforesaid, together with all interest accrued thereon, without further legislation or appropriation; and the third shall be delivered to said company.

That would seem to make the Government liable for interest upon the proceeds of these pre-emption claims. I presume that is not the intention of the bill; but it would seem that the Government would become liable for the interest on the sums of money paid into the Treasury on these pre-emption claims. I see in section 8 there is this proviso:

> That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to invest said proceeds for the benefit of the company constructing such road, in United States securities, and the same dispose of from time to time as the road is constructed.

This interest I presume refers to that; but there ought to be some words making it more definite and certain, so that the Government will not become responsible for interest upon the proceeds of these pre-emption claims.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would inquire of my friend if there is, after all, any real objection to that? It is the object to give these proceeds in aid of this enterprise. Is there any objection to giving the interest that would accrue on these particular proceeds?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think that the United States Treasury ought to be made a bank of deposit wherein any and everybody can put his funds and make the tax-payers of this country pay interest whether they receive any or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not the object of this bill to compel the Government to pay interest unless they receive it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I presumed not.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is only that which will accrue on these proceeds. I will accept any amendment that will make it more plain.

Mr. COCKRELL. I presume that was the intention of it, and that was the reason why I called the attention of the Senate to it. Say:

> With all interest accrued thereon on investments made as hereinafter provided.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to that; that will make it perfectly plain.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then in lines 20 and 21 of section 6 I move to insert after the word "thereon" the words "on the money invested as hereinafter provided."

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "thereon" in line 21 of section 6 it is proposed to insert:

> On the money invested as hereinafter provided.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I desire to ask the Senator one question: whether under this bill—I have not had time to compare all its provisions and the different sections with each other—the Government becomes liable to pay to this company any money in lieu of any lands which may have been granted along the road for which the Government does not receive compensation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not one dollar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to, being to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

> That three years' additional time from the passage of this act is hereby granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company for the completion of the construction of its railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria, Oregon, under its charter, and the act of Congress, of which this is amendatory, relating thereto, except as herein otherwise provided.
> SEC. 2. That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices the lands embraced in such entry shall not be held as within the grant to said company, and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and under the provisions of this section, and, in case of abandonment by them, shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only of actual settlers.
> SEC. 3. That entries remaining unadjusted and suspended in the General Land Office on account of an increase of price of the even sections within the limits of the grant, where the same were made or based upon settlement made prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal aforesaid at the respective district land offices, shall be relieved from such suspension, and carried into patent; but nothing in this act shall be construed to affect existing adjustments, nor to authorize the refunding of any moneys received for such lands under existing laws.
> SEC. 4. That the lands upon the whole of the present non-completed line of road from Portland to Astoria, granted in aid of its construction, with the exception of its right of way and lands appurtenant thereto, on either side thereof, necessary to be used in the construction and in the operation of said road or line, and that required for depots, freight-houses, side-tracks, water-stations, wharves, and other purposes essential to the operation of the road or line, and excepting lands already earned by said Oregon Central Railroad Company, shall be disposed of by the United States, to actual settlers only by pre-emption, in quantities not exceeding one quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres, to one person, at the price of $2.50 per acre, payment to be made by such settler to the United States, as provided by law: Provided, That iron and coal lands granted to the said Oregon Central Railroad Company shall not be subject to pre-emption and sale under the provisions of this act, but shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior under the general laws of the United States applicable to such lands, and the net proceeds thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and applied to the benefit of said company, as hereinafter mentioned.
> SEC. 5. That the proceeds of the sales of the land before mentioned shall be set apart by the Secretary of the Treasury to the credit of the said corporation, and shall be paid over by him to such corporation, its trustees or assigns, in the event the road is constructed by said Oregon Central Railroad Company, or, if constructed by any other company under the provisions of this act, then to such other company, its trustees or assigns, without further legislation or appropriation, as hereinafter provided, and not otherwise.
> SEC. 6. That on the completion and acceptance of any one or more sections of said road of twenty miles each, as provided under existing laws, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, as soon and as often as the surveys and plats of any one or more townships or fraction of a township within the grant upon such accepted section or sections of road shall be approved, to cause to be made in triplicate a complete abstract, showing, first, lands unsold, and to which no pre-emption rights have attached, and so earned by the company; second, lands sold, and the amount of proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury; and, third, lands to which pre-emptions shall have attached prior to the completion and acceptance of such section or sections as aforesaid, and for which payment has not then been made. The first of said abstracts shall be retained in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, upon which patents shall issue to the corporation for the lands therein stated to have been earned; the second shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon pay to the corporation the sum or sums of money in such abstract stated as aforesaid, together with all interest accrued thereon, on the money invested as hereinafter provided, without further legislation or appropriation; and the third shall be delivered to said company.

SEC. 7. From the date of the completion and acceptance of any section or sections of said road, and of such public notice thereof as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, the lands within said grant, and adjacent to such completed section or sections, and designated by odd numbers, and to which pre-emption rights shall not have attached, shall no longer be open to settlement and pre-emption as aforesaid, but shall be patented as aforesaid to the said corporation; and all pre-emption claims shall be paid for within the time now fixed by law for the payment of pre-emption claims; otherwise they shall be deemed forfeited to such railroad company, and shall be patented to such company. But Congress may, for any good reason, extend the time for the payment for pre-emption claims.

SEC. 8. That rights under pre-emption claims attaching to lands as aforesaid, within completed and accepted sections, shall be proceeded in and determined under the general laws and regulations respecting such claims until paid for or forfeited, and patents for the same shall be issued direct to the settlers on compliance with the laws in relation thereto. And the proceeds of all sales of pre-emptions which have not been paid to the United States prior to the completion and acceptance of any one or more sections as aforesaid, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and by the Secretary of the Treasury paid to said railroad company, its trustees or assigns: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to invest said proceeds for the benefit of the company constructing such road in United States securities, and the same dispose of from time to time as the road is constructed. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to file with the Secretary of the Treasury quarterly statements of the sales of all lands included in this grant and designated by odd numbers, giving location and description of such lands, and the amount of the proceeds arising from such sales: Provided further, That all lands that may be patented to the company constructing said railroad under the provisions of this act (excepting iron and coal lands) shall be sold by such company in quantities not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

SEC. 9. That the extensions, franchises, and privileges granted by this act to the said Oregon Central Railroad Company are on the express condition that such company shall, within nine months from the approval of this act, commence the construction of the uncompleted portion of said road and telegraph line at the proper point of junction with the present road running to McMinnville, at or near Forest Grove, and construct and equip, within one year thereafter, not less than fifty miles thereof, and shall complete and equip the whole thereof to Astoria, Oregon, within three years from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 10. That if the said Oregon Central Railroad Company shall not commence the construction of said incompleted road at the junction aforesaid within nine months from the date of the approval of this act as aforesaid, and prosecute the construction of the same as provided in the preceding section, then any corporation duly incorporated and organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, and which shall, within nine months from the approval of this act, and prior to any other company, file with the Secretary of the Interior a notice of its intention to construct such road and telegraph line in the event of a failure on the part of said Oregon Central Railroad Company, may, at any time within three months after such failure upon the part of the said Oregon Central Railroad Company either to commence or prosecute as aforesaid, proceed, in like manner and upon like conditions, to the commencement and construction of such road, either at the point of junction aforesaid, at or near Forest Grove, or at the city of Astoria, Oregon; and such company shall be entitled to the aid granted for its construction by completing at least twenty-five miles of such road within one year after such commencement, and the whole thereof within three years from the date of the approval of this act; and as often as there shall be such failure, any other company next in order in the date of its notice with the Secretary of the Interior shall have the right, at any time within three months from the date of such failure, to proceed with such construction upon like conditions and with like benefits.

SEC. 11. That the sections designated by even numbers within the limits of the grant upon the line of the said Oregon Central Railroad be, and the same are hereby declared to be, from the date of the approval of this act, open to settlement and pre-emption, at the price of $2.50 per acre, and to homesteads, in quantities not exceeding one-quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres, to be taken in conformity to the existing pre-emption and homestead laws: Provided further, That all persons who, under the restrictions of the existing laws granting lands to aid in the construction of said road, have taken homesteads of not exceeding eighty acres, shall have the privilege of increasing the amount of their said homesteads by extending their claims to contiguous lands, so that the aggregate shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres; this to be done under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 12. That the said Oregon Central Railroad Company, or any other company authorized under this act to construct said railroad, is hereby authorized to issue its bonds, from time to time, not exceeding $25,000 per mile, to aid in the construction and equipment of its said road, and to secure the same by mortgage on the whole or any part of its railroad and property, and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, with the rights, privileges, and functions thereto appertaining; and as proof and notice of the legal execution and effectual delivery thereof, such mortgage shall be filed and recorded in the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 13. That the said Oregon Central Railroad Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within six months from the date hereof, its assent to the provisions of this act, or be forever debarred from taking or receiving any benefit from or under the same.

SEC. 14. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time, and the act of which this is amendatory, and to provide by law against unjust discriminations and excessive charges on the part of said company.

SEC. 15. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. EATON. My attention has just been called to this bill. This railroad company was chartered by the Legislature of Oregon, as I understand the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. I ask, then, what have we to do with saying that it may issue bonds? What has the Senate of the United States to do with that? My own impression is that that legislation should be required at the hands of the Legislature of Oregon.

I notice by this bill we empower this railroad company—

To issue its bonds, from time to time, not exceeding $25,000 per mile, to aid in the construction and equipment of its said road, and to secure the same by mortgage on the whole or any part of its railroad and property, and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions.

I submit that we have no right to legislate in that manner. I do not apprehend that when the State of Massachusetts charters a railroad company, that corporation will come to Congress and ask for power to issue bonds. I suppose the Legislature of Massachusetts can attend to that matter. So with the Legislature of Ohio or the Legislature of any other State in this Union. I am opposed to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose that if Congress grants aid to any company, if it has power to do that, it has all the powers to do whatever is necessary in order to make the aid available, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. EATON. That does not follow.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I am not particular about that. The State can give them the power. I presume they have the power. If the Senator makes a point on that, strike it out.

Mr. EATON. I shall make a point on that, and I have one or two other objections. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired and the Chair will call up the unfinished business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses at four o'clock p. m. on Thursday, the 16th instant, for the purpose of enabling Senators and Representatives to attend the funeral of the late Joseph Henry.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4704) to retire certain silver coins now in use, and to provide for the exchange of subsidiary silver coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] having submitted an amendment to the bill, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] raised the point of order on the amendment that it was not in order under the twenty-ninth rule. That question was submitted to the Senate. The question is, is the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas in order upon this bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the rule under which I propose this point of order is the twenty-ninth rule of the Senate. It was adopted only a little more than a year ago, and I wish to read to the Senate the standing rule of the Senate as it stood down to the adoption of this rule, in order to show, as I think I can clearly, that the spirit and purpose, as well as the literal tenor of this rule that is now in force, was to cure the infelicities that had existed under the previous rules on this very question of riding on to appropriation bills every scheme that everybody had, however patriotic or however otherwise, to draw money from the Treasury and engage the responsibility of the United States in fresh undertakings. The old rule on the subject of amendments to appropriation bills was Rule 30, which read in this way:

No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I raise the point of order that part of the twenty-ninth rule is that the "relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am addressing myself, Mr. President, to the other part of this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question was ruled on yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On which I believe the Senator from Texas can put no bridle on my mouth. Now I will begin again. The old rule was—

No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill—

Mark the word "general" both in the old rule and in the present one as applied to the nature of this bill, because it has a bearing in the application of the word "general" to the "legislation" mentioned in the present twenty-ninth rule—unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate—

As this amendment is—or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

Then follows the clause that—

All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate proposing new items of appropriation shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That was the old rule. Under that rule every species of legislation that anybody wished to move upon an appropriation bill, so that it did not increase an appropriation, might be moved by any Senator without the authority of a committee; any that proposed additional appropriations must be moved by the direction of a standing or select committee; but if moved by the direction of a standing or select committee, no matter how extensive the proposition was, no matter how much money it involved, no matter how far it was from the actual appropriations provided for in the bill, no matter how sweeping was the legislation that it contained, whether upon universal subjects or upon particular subjects, it was in order, and the Senate was forced to vote upon it in the absence of that careful and independent consideration of it upon its own merits and disconnected with other propositions it might be.

That being the state of the case, we came along to 1871–'72. A special order was made by the Senate on the 29th of April, 1872—not a standing rule but a special order for that session, in this language:

Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess; and pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate; and no amendment to any such bill making legislative provisions other than such as directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill shall be received.

That provided only for "legislative provisions;" it did not contain what the twenty-ninth rule does now—the question of the relation of particular items in the bill to the particular propositions advanced by the amendment. That was agreed to by 33 yeas to 13 nays. The first question that arose under it was about a week or ten days afterward when it was proposed to insert in the legislative appropriation bill provisions respecting the appointment of persons prosecuting claims, &c. The question of order was raised and it was decided that as that related to the particular provisions stated in the bill, it was in order. The next occasion was on the very same day on the post-office appropriation bill——

Mr. SARGENT. What is the date?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the 7th of May, 1872. First an amendment was moved by Mr. Fenton to strike out in section 4, lines 25 and 26, "for steamship service between the United States and Brazil $150,000," and insert "for steamship service between the United States and Brazil $400,000; and the Postmaster-General is directed to increase the service" in a certain way prescribed. No point of order was made on that, and the amendment was agreed to by a vote of 25 to 24. Then Mr. Casserly of California—being the second step in the subsidy business—proposed to insert, instead of striking out and inserting as the previous amendment had been, to provide for San Francisco, the Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, and Australia. A question of order was raised by Mr. Chandler "whether the amendment was in order under the last clause of the resolution of the Senate of April 29th last, which requires that all amendments shall directly relate to the appropriation contained in the bill."

That was not on the point of its being legislation, but the point was made on the question of its relation to the appropriations contained in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT submitted the question of order to the Senate:

"Does the proposed amendment directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill?"

That was determined in the affirmative, yeas 31, nays 19. There the Senate held that the California subsidy did relate to the appropriations contained in the bill, there being, I think you will find, as there was in the case of Brazil, a provision for steamship service between San Francisco and China a general round sum, and that was changed to make special provisions upon the subject.

The next time the question arose was on the 18th of May when "the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration" of the Army appropriation bill and Mr. Stewart raised the question of order that a provision repealing section 9 of the act of March 3, 1871, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1872, &c., was out of order as being legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT decided that the point of order was well taken, and ruled the amendment out of order.

And that decision was acquiesced in. There the Senate will see the question was whether legislative provisions under this temporary rule of April, 1872, fell within the scope of the proposition contained in the rule of the Senate; and a simple provision in the Army bill which provided for repealing the ninth section of an act relating to the Army previously passed was held to be legislation upon general topics within the prohibition of the rule, with universal acquiescence.

The next time the question arose was on the sundry civil bill on the 4th of June. The question was to "agree to the reported amendment," reported by the Committee on Appropriations:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to pay, for expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities in the Territory of Montana, Certain amounts mentioned in certain reports of Army officers.

Mr. SHERMAN raised the question of order, that the said amendment did not directly relate to any appropriation contained in the bill.

That was under the relation clause and not under the legislation clause as Senators will see:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ramsey in the chair) sustained the point of order made by Mr. Sherman, and decided that the amendment was not in order. * * *

From this decision of the Chair, Mr. Pomeroy appealed to the Senate.

After debate, on motion of one of the Senators the appeal was laid on the table, the Senate thereby sustaining the decision of the Chair as laying an appeal on the table under such circumstances, as the bill goes on, acquiesced in the decision.

On the next occasion, there was a river and harbor bill before the Senate, which, by this rule—a part of it that I did not read—is also brought under the operation of the same provision. The question was to amend by this proviso:

Provided, That to enable the Secretary of War to comply with the provisions of this act, so much of the sixth section of the act approved March 3, 1869—

Giving its title—

as applies to the Engineer Department, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, made the point of order that the said reported amendment, being in its nature a legislative provision, other than such as directly relates to an appropriation in the bill, could not be received under the resolution of April 29, 1872.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Pomeroy in the chair) sustained the point of order made by Mr. Morrill, of Maine, and decided the amendment not to be in order.

* * * * * * * * *

From this decision of the Chair, Mr. Chandler appealed to the Senate. * * *

On the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

It was determined in the affirmative.

Then they changed it, and Mr. Pomeroy left the chair and took the floor and moved to amend by providing that—

To enable the Secretary of War to comply with the provisions of this act, so much of the sixth section of the act approved March 3, 1869, &c., be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, made the point of order that that amendment, being in its nature a legislative provision, could not be received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) having submitted the question to the decision of the Senate, viz: Is the amendment of Mr. Pomeroy in order under the resolution of the Senate of 29th April last?

It was determined in the negative.

There the Senate again, although the phraseology was changed to get it in order if possible, reaffirmed the substance of the decision that it had made before.

The next time that a question of this kind arose was on a subject referred to yesterday, I think by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] which he called a civil-rights bill, in which he was mistaken. It was on the sundry civil bill that a proposition was made by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] The bill containing provisions for carrying into effect the registration and voting powers of the people, he moved to amend the section which the act proposed to furnish money to carry into effect, by striking out certain words and inserting others, striking out "having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants," and the words "city" or "town" wherever they occurred and inserting instead thereof the words "county or parish," and so on, changing merely the detailed phraseology of the provisions of the law that the sundry civil bill in respect of a large item that it had in it was appropriating money to carry into effect, so as to direct the use of money already appropriated to a wholly different object in respect of description, by striking out "city or town" and inserting "county or parish" for the registration business. The question of order was raised on that by Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland.

That the amendment was in its nature a legislative provision which did not directly relate to any appropriation contained in the bill, and therefore could not be received under the resolution of the Senate of the 29th April last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) overruled the question of order made by Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, and decided that the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG was in order.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. THURMAN appealed to the Senate.

The decision of the Chair was sustained—yeas 28, nays 22. And that, as I have stated, was upon the ground that this provision merely directed the application of the money that was already contained in the bill as an appropriation for the expenses of registration in counties and parishes, instead of cities and towns as the law stood. That was a very doubtful question. I find that I voted with the majority, which was probably on account of my love for fair voting; I do not mean by that that my friend from Ohio loved anything else; but the Senate sustained that decision of the Chair, which is in perfect harmony, (although it comes very close to the line and perhaps goes over it,) with the previous decisions holding as in cases like this with a persistent regularity on the question of legislation, that an amendment of this character was a legislative provision which could not be introduced.

Then, in order to show the distinction upon which the Senate proceeded in holding that the last amendment I have referred to was admissible, let me call your attention to what followed on the same bill where the Senate decided a proposition to be out of order as coming within the scope of the rule Mr. Sumner moved to amend the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG, which I have already referred to, by inserting at the end thereof the civil-rights bill containing five or six sections about "carriage by land, by water," and all that.

Mr. COLE made the point of order that the amendment was in the nature of a legislative provision which did not relate to any appropriation contained in the bill, and therefore could not be received under the resolution of the Senate of the 29th April last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMEROY in the chair) sustained the point of order.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Sumner appealed to the Senate.

The judgment of the Senate was that the decision of the Chair was right, by a vote of 33 to 6, affirming again then as it had done on the previous occasions most positively and by large majorities, that a clear and definite new provision which did not have anything to do with the objects contained in the bill, not in respect of the service with which the bill had to do, any proposition which went outside of regulating the expenditure of the very moneys already contained in the bill was entirely out of order, and anything which went to the extent of making a general legislative provision or a particular legislative provision by legislation which was general and permanent in its character, as providing for entering into contracts—one of the very instances that I have already brought to your attention—was out of order.

That ended that session I believe. Then at the next session the same special order was readopted and the first time the question arose was on the Navy bill.

On motion by Mr. Nye further to amend the bill by inserting after line 533 the following:

"Provided, That the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering may be appointed from the list of engineer officers having the relative rank of captain or commander in the Navy;"

Mr. SPRAGUE made the question of order that the said amendment did not directly relate to any appropriation contained in the bill, and therefore could not be received under the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair) sustained the point of order raised by Mr. Sprague, and decided the amendment of Mr. Nye not to be in order under the said resolution.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Nye appealed to the Senate.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. FERRY, of Michigan,

"Ordered, That the appeal lie on the table."

The Senate there sustained the decision of the Chair that one single provision not relating to the expenditure of money provided for already in the bill, one single provision respecting one single officer of the Navy of the United States, was of that character that the rule was designed to exclude from these bills appropriating money to carry out the laws of the United States.

Then we had the sundry civil bill in 1873 and on that bill the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr ANTHONY] moved to amend an amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations by providing—

That the joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to direct the Congressional Printer to contract, on behalf of the United States of America—

Just as the Postmaster-General is here authorized to contract for carrying these mails—with William J. Murtagh, of Washington, District of Columbia, for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress.

And providing a detailed scheme just as this amendment provides the details of this Brazilian scheme.

Mr. TRUMBULL raised a question of order, namely, that the amendment was in its nature a legislative provision which did not directly relate to any appropriation contained in the bill, and therefore could not be received under the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant.

These were special resolutions, as I have stated, from session to session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair) submitted the question of order to the decision of the Senate; and

On the question, is the amendment of Mr. ANTHONY in order under the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant? It was determined in the negative; yeas 25, nays 28.

The argument in favor of that made by the Senator from Rhode Island and others was that there was in that bill a distinct provision for publishing the debates of Congress; money had been appropriated for that purpose; and therefore it was urged that it did relate to the application of the money provided for in the bill, and would therefore fall within the decision of the Senate in respect to changing the words "city or town" to "county or parish" in the miscellaneous bill about registration, and there was great force in the argument; but the Senate either thought there was a distinction or held that it had decided wrong in respect of the provisions I have referred to about registration, and decided that the amendment was not in order.

It is due to the candor which should characterize any discussion in this body, that I should say that not long afterward and on the same bill the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] from the Committee on Printing, moved what was substantially the same amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] had moved, and Mr. Sprague raised the question of order "that the amendment is in its nature a legislative provision," and the Vice-President submitted the point of order to the decision of the Senate, and the Senate decided then that it was in order, yeas 32, nays 27, going back to the principle that they had already adopted in the case of legislative amendments, that it was merely relating to the expenditure of the very money that the bill had appropriated for public printing, and as I said the argument can be stated with great force on that side of the question.

I could go on coming down to the latest time that this order was in force, 1873–'74, and then it dropped out for four or five years until it was readopted in the general rules last year. In every instance that I have been able to find, except these that I have mentioned as deciding apparently the other way and I have stated the ground of them; in every instance like this where there is no money in the bill to provide for the payment of the contracts, where there is no legislation in the bill which has anything whatever to do with the subject of a line of steamers from here to Brazil and the provision offered is one clearly of a general legislative character providing for carrying on the general operations of the Government—which is what is meant by "general legislation" as distinguished from a private claim or something of that sort—I say there is no instance that I have been able to find (some may exist but it has escaped my eye) where in a case of this kind the Senate has not persistently said under these standing orders that it had during these sessions of the Senate that the amendment could not be received.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to one?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. SARGENT. Shortly after the adoption of the rule that is now in force—I refer to volume 5, part 3, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress, second session—on the 21st day of February, 1877, the post-office appropriation bill being under consideration, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, moved an amendment, which I will not read at length, because I do not wish to trespass on the Senator's time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a trespass.

Mr. SARGENT. It provided:

That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to continue the steamship mail service between San Francisco, Japan, and China for one year with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, upon the terms specified under the act of February 17, 1865, and February 18, 1867, "for transporting a monthly mail from San Francisco, Japan, and China," at the same terms and conditions so far as applicable; and the Postmaster-General is directed to continue said service as herein provided.

An amendment to this was moved by Mr. Bogy:

And that the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for a monthly mail service from New Orleans to Rio Janeiro; and the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into a contract for this purpose with any party or parties to carry said mails in American built and owned vessels and of not less than two thousand tons burden, and of approved construction and seaworthy.

These amendments were subsequently modified in terms, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] raised the question of order whether it was not new legislation under this rule which the Senator has read at length. The Chair overruled the point of order, and said that under the new rule of the Senate he would submit that question to the Senate. The question was taken, and the Senate sustained the Chair. I am somewhat surprised not to find in the Journal a notice of this point of order and the action of the Senate upon it. It obviously did not attract the attention of the compiler; but the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sets it out in full, with the reasons pro and con and the decision of the Senate, and that in every essential particular that I can see embraces the principles which are here involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot find it in the Journal at all.

Mr. SARGENT. There is only one difference that can possibly be made between the two cases. Some Senators there objected that the point of order was raised too late, because the Senate had already discussed the proposition and acted upon it in Committee of the Whole; but I believe it has been uniformly held under the rules that a point of order may be raised at any time if the proposition is obnoxious to it. That is the only interpretation of this rule that I know of since its adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think as this is the only precedent which seems to come anywhere near having an affirmative bearing upon this present amendment and is in the face of all the previous decisions of the Senate that I have read apparently, I had better read just what occurred, and I will go back a little earlier. There had been an amendment pending for some time reported by the committee or offered by Mr. Bogy.

Mr. SARGENT. His amendment was to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] from the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but whether the bill itself contained a provision for the China service as it came from the House I do not know.

Mr. SARGENT. It did not. I remember the circumstance distinctly. The China service had expired the year before. The Post-Office Committee thought it should be continued. The Committee on Appropriations reported no provision for it in the bill; but in the Senate the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads moved the amendment continuing it another year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend a little upon exactly when it expired. That would need to be looked up in order to make this a precedent. I see there was a long debate on the subject.

Mr. SARGENT. It expired with the current year. This bill was to take effect from the 1st of July next ensuing, and on that day the service expired, having been appropriated for the previous year. The service was then going on, but would expire at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The service was existing, and existing under a contract. When the contract would expire, I do not know. The Senator thinks it would have expired before this appropriation would come into play. Then an amendment was proposed to provide money for continuing that existing service. That is the very most that can be made of the case. Now let us see what took place. After it had been debated for a whole day or more:

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit whether the proposed amendment is not in fact a violation of the rule which provides that no general legislation shall be incorporated into an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not change the amount agreed to in committee.

That is the answer of the President pro tempore to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. It provides, however, in fact there shall be a mail carried between San Francisco and China and Japan. There is no existing law which provides for it, and without this provision the mail could not be carried under specific contract.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest that the amendment has been offered and acted upon in the Senate and the time has passed when the question could be raised, if it were a question to be raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to state that in Committee of the Whole the Senate agreed to a certain amount and like service embraced in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. Therefore, it is not a new proposition. The amount is not increased, nor is the nature of the service changed. The point of order was not made in Committee of the Whole, and it is too late to make it now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit whether the point of order cannot be raised at any time whenever the Senate wishes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the new rules as to the question of relevancy the Chair will submit to the Senate whether the amendment to the amendment is relevant under the rule.

When that question was submitted an amendment had already been agreed to in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate as a part of the general body of the bill, and was under consideration; then the amendment, the question of the relevancy of which was submitted by the Chair to the Senate, was an amendment to that provision, which did not, as the Chair correctly stated, either change the sum or the nature of the service. Then what did the Chair submit? The Chair submitted this:

Whether the amendment to the amendment is relevant under the rule. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senate decides that the amendment to the amendment is relevant. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as modified.

Mr. President, I am sure every Senator, as that question stood at that moment, must have been obliged to decide exactly the same way. You had already got into the bill—under the decision of the Chair, in an attitude that you could not get it out on a point of order—a provision for that very thing. The amendment, therefore, which the Senate decided to be relevant was an amendment on that very point, to change, not the sum nor the general nature of the proposition, but only to regulate the detail of the thing that the Senate had already fixed in the bill where the Chair decided it could not be got out. It would have been amazing, therefore, if the Senate should have decided that that amendment to a proposition already irrevocably in the bill as far as order went would not be in order.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to interfere with the time of my friend, but I should like to make one remark.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator may just as well do it now.

Mr. SARGENT. Following the course of reasoning the Senator has adopted, it would seem that the Senate must have been very strangely wrong in holding that that was relevant. It certainly was not relevant to the existing service between the United States and China and Japan, for it was thousands and thousands of miles away. It was not relevant to anything in the bill, for there was no legislation authorizing any service between New York and Rio de Janeiro or New Orleans and Rio de Janeiro. It was a naked whole proposition hung on to an entirely dissimilar proposition. If it went off on the score of relevancy, the Senate certainly was very wrong in holding that it was relevant to any provision in the bill, for there was no provision in the bill that related to the subject of general mail service between New Orleans and Rio de Janeiro; and the fact that in Committee of the Whole the Senate had put a proposition on putting on a new service, putting it on for a new year, when by law it expired before that new year commenced, between the United States and China and Japan, did not make a similar service between other points any more relevant than it would have been if the China service had not been put in at all.

It seems to me the only logical inference to be drawn from the action of the Senate on that case was that this was relevant and proper upon the bill because it was for the mail service of the United States, whether at home or abroad. Perhaps the Senator himself would have raised the point if he had been present on that occasion; and I notice that he was not, and therefore he was not guilty of an inconsistency in not raising the point at that time and is excusable. He having been detained by some business or other, he could not have raised the question at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was a good deal of business going on that demanded more attention than points of order, at that time.

Mr. SARGENT. I am aware of it, and quite a number of Senators were absent, and therefore I make no point that the Senator did not raise the point of order at that time, for he could not do it. I think if he had been present he would have insisted, and insisted with force, with the peculiar power that he possesses on such questions, that it could not possibly be relevant to that bill, that it was new legislation under the rule, and that the Senate ought not to decide that it was otherwise. That was certainly a fair inference from the rule if the Senator's argument this morning is good.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I do not know what the precise amendment there was; that is, the amendment to the amendment, because I did not take time to read it. I only took the statement of the Chair to be correct, that it was an amendment perfectly within the scope of the original amendment, only changing that, that it did not increase the amount and did not change the service. That is what the Chair stated. I assume that the Chair stated it truly. I did not take time to read what the precise amendment was. If, as the Senator says, it was a perfectly cold and new proposition, then the Chair was plainly wrong in saying the point of order came too late because it had not then been received and adopted and agreed to, but I do not know how that is, and perhaps it is not very material.

It is quite obvious that in the state of things existing on the 21st of February, 1877, and with the slight amount of attention that was called to it under the rule which had just been adopted and with no discussion of it, it amounted to anything at all upon either side. There was a mere statement of the question with an endeavor undoubtedly in a hurry to get rid of it in some way. I do not think it can be drawn in as a precedent which ought to weigh with us now when for the first time we are called to face the responsibility of giving one construction or another to this rule.

I have shown to you, Mr. President, and I think with some success, that for three or four years when the substance of this rule was a special order of the Senate from session to session, whenever this question came up, and it came up often, in every instance of a case like this for a new proposition not relating to the disposition of the money contained in the original bill but for a new and distinct service, whether it was a service for the Army or the Navy or the home service or the foreign service—I repeat in every instance the Senate on the question made and on the yeas and nays decided that such propositions were not in order and that the old rule existing in 1866 and down to 1872 had been changed by this special rule for the very purpose of excluding what had been the constant practice of running on to appropriation bills all manner of schemes and subsidies and jobs and what not.

If we are to hold in this way, the rule of 1866 was just as good as the rule of 1877. It was exactly this kind of amendment about naval contracts, about post-office contracts, about steamship subsidies, about railway subsidies, about reorganizing the Army and making a general muss, if I may use such a phrase, of the legislation of the United States on an appropriation bill, that the Senate desired and set itself deliberately to correct by not leaving the rule to stand as it did in 1866 on such subjects, but declaring three distinct things: first, that general legislative provisions—and I believe I have explained sufficiently that that is a general legislative provision which relates to the general welfare as distinguished from a private bill, just as this is a general appropriation bill called so in the rules, called so in our practice always, not because it is a provision for all the service of the country, it relates to one small branch of the service of the country, but it is a general appropriation bill because it is an appropriation bill for the general good, although the appropriations are applied to special and particular objects of public expenditure. As I say, the repeated judgments of the Senate have been whenever there has been discussion and reflection upon the subject since this change was made, made as I say for the purpose of excluding the consideration of questions of this kind upon appropriation bills, however meritorious they may be, that these things ought not to be received. Now we have incorporated for the first time last year into the standing rules of the Senate the special provision that for two or three years in 1871, 1872 and 1873 was adopted by the Senate for its ordinary work for that session; and we are told now in opposition to this point of order that precisely the kinds of amendment that could be tolerated under your old rules are receivable under the new one, although the new one was made confessedly to exclude this species of legislation.

We have gained nothing, therefore, according to this argument, by adopting the twenty-ninth rule. What do you come to then? You have got it, then, just as you had it in 1866. My honorable friend who is interested in commerce with Brazil—I do not mean "interested" in the sense of having his pocket in it but his patriotic heart in it, as I am sure all our hearts are—instead of having this measure stand upon its own merits, it being a bill before us for consideration, chooses to urge it upon the post-office appropriation bill not because there is any money appropriated in the post-office bill for this service, as it is merely a regulation of it; not because it has anything to do with any part of the service that the bill provides for; but because he believes it to be for the general welfare that this independent and new proposition should be enacted into a law. Then comes the proposition of my honorable friend from California, this being received, to provide for a subsidy to a steamship line to the Sandwich Islands and another that it shall stretch over the ten thousand miles of the tranquil sea to Yokohama and Hong-Kong.

Mr. SARGENT. Why does the Senator say "the Senator from California?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because he is nearest to that golden shore.

Mr. SARGENT. But have I offered any such amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No.

Mr. SARGENT. Am I in favor of any such amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. I hope not.

Mr. SARGENT. I have tried as well as I could to restrict the evil of Chinese immigration; and I am not prepared to build any more bridges to China.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now my honorable friend supposes I am making a personal application. I beg him not to misunderstand me.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator did not intend it, but I do not wish to be put in a false position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not intend to misrepresent the Senator. I am only stating what might happen. If it is disagreeable to the Senator, I will take another Senator. Here comes my honorable friend from Maine, the extreme tip northeasterly corner of the United States, then, who may say: "Let us now cross the Pacific with a line from the Golden Gate to Hong-Kong; let us put up a subsidy of $125,000 a year, paying that on a ten years' contract to carry the mails, and to build iron steamships that may be devoted to war purposes, or sold, it may be, for Russian or English privateers just as the occasion warrants, and build up the commerce of the country there." It all relates to this affair; it is not general legislation; it is only special legislation, and in one sense it is very special. There are a good many people within the sound of my voice above this floor who have a special interest in it I have no doubt.

Then comes another Senator, I will say myself from Vermont, because I have a great admiration for the birds of New Zealand. There are some of the most extraordinary objects of the feathered tribe there on the globe. I propose a line that shall start from New York, or from Otter Creek on Lake Champlain, or somewhere on the borders of this great Republic, and have a tri-monthly, or tri-yearly, or tri-weekly steamship line to New Zealand. Great objects can be gained by it. Wool is raised there that would fill up the factories of New England; but whether it would make the heart of a Vermont wool-grower glad or not, I do not know; but it would make the manufacturer of wool glad because he would get it cheaper. Would it not develop the industry of the United States? Who can be so dead to patriotic impulses as to be trifling about points of order upon such a great proposition? Why, Mr. President, we can load up that bill with all the beneficial schemes—tariff or free trade, reform of the judiciary system, or whatever that our patriotic impulses and our ingenuity in framing and introducing bills (which is not small) may devise under this provision of the rule this way construed.

Now, the question is for the first time to set an example about this business, whether we really mean to keep an appropriation bill what the law contemplates, what our rules contemplate, what good sense and fair play contemplate; that is, the appropriation of the public money to carry on the existing and legal service of the United States. If we mean to make such bills the omnibus to put our pet and favorite schemes and measures in all together and then put all our shoulders to the wheel and roll them through, let us say so and admit this amendment and all the rest. If we do not, but intend that every measure, be it good or ill, shall stand on its own merit or want of merit and be considered by itself, then let us have the courage to say, what this rule plainly does say, that this legislative provision which not only is legislative and general in its character but which also has no relation to any appropriation in the bill, no relation to any item of it, shall stay out and be considered upon its own merits.

Mr. HILL. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I have been a member of this body but a short time and I therefore take a position on such a question with great caution, and the more so because in the short time I have been a member of this body I have learned to have very little respect for an argument based upon precedents, especially the precedents of this body and the practices of this body. I arrived at the same conclusion after a short service in the House of Representatives. I find that a gentleman can prove anything he chooses to prove by precedents of these two Houses. The Senator from Vermont can most conclusively prove his side of the question by the precedents of this body; and any other gentleman who chooses to look through the Journals can prove the other side with equal conclusiveness; and I have come to the conclusion that when Senators desire, as a general rule, to accomplish a given proposition and are in favor of a proposition before the Senate they care nothing about the rules; they go for the proposition; and when they are opposed to a proposition, then they get exceedingly critical about rules and they enforce the rules with great care. The result is, I must confess, that, young as I am as a member of this body, I cannot have respect for an argument that is based on the mere practices of the body. I am sorry to say so.

Now I will take warning; at least I have endeavored heretofore in the little time I have been a member of this body to take warning, and I shall guard myself in the future on this subject. I therefore have adopted a rule as a member of this body to vote upon no proposition according to my predilections or according to my real wishes, but according to my convictions of what is right. A short time ago following that rule I found myself compelled to differ with the Judiciary Committee on a very grave proposition. When my whole heart was with them my whole head was against them. I find, too, the general rule is to assign a gentleman's position on the merits of a proposition according to any mere conviction he may have as to the constitutionality of the question or the regularity of its order of adoption.

I protest that the conclusion that I may have arrived at upon this question of order shall not be construed by anybody to determine what I think of the measure before the body. I may or may not be in favor of subsidizing the proposed line. All I have to say now is let no gentleman assume that I am either for or against the main proposition because of the conclusion at which I may have arrived upon this question of order. Without, therefore, being influenced in the slightest degree by the precedents which can be produced on both sides without number, I am going to take my position on this question, take the venture at least of voting according as I think is the proper construction of this rule as applicable to this proposed amendment.

We are considering, Mr. President, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department. That is the bill, one making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department. Now what do you understand by a bill making appropriations? I may be wrong; if I am Senators may correct me; but I understand the business, the proper function of an appropriation bill is to appropriate money to authorize the executive department to carry out the existing law. Members of Congress are entitled to receive $5,000 a year for their salaries. I believe, by the way, that they get that sum by an amendment to an appropriation bill. The President is entitled to receive $50,000 a year for his salary, which I believe also he gets by an amendment to an appropriation bill. If I am not mistaken, the salaries of members of Congress and of the President were all raised by an appropriation bill. But that money cannot be paid unless it is appropriated.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to state rather an interesting fact in that connection, that an amendment was moved to an appropriation bill increasing the President's salary, and it was held out of order on an appeal from the decision of the Chair by a very large majority? Then it was renewed, including an increase of salaries of members of Congress themselves, and it was held in order by an equally large majority. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Precisely. Was that proper? I do not think it was; and to be candid, whatever may be my opinions or desires about the merits of the scheme proposed by this amendment, I do not believe it is proper as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and therefore I shall be compelled to vote against it. It is not an appropriation. Here we have three or four sections, embracing four pages, authorizing the Postmaster-General to enter into a contract to subsidize a steamship line. What is the purpose? Honorable gentlemen may argue that it is for the purpose of increasing the commerce of the country, and it may be a very desirable thing to increase the commerce of the country. Very well; it is a desirable thing to increase the commerce of the country, and it may be a very desirable thing to accomplish the very thing proposed by the amendment; but that is not the question before the Senate. The question before the Senate is, Is it proper as an amendment to a general appropriation bill? and I am called upon to say in my character as a Senator, do I consider that this scheme is proper as an amendment to this appropriation bill.

It does not appropriate anything. There is nothing in this amendment appropriating one dollar for this purpose. This amendment is simply a bill, an act of legislation injected into the appropriation bill, authorizing the Postmaster-General to make a contract; but then it fails to appropriate the money to execute that contract; it does not appropriate a dollar to carry out that contract. If he makes it, where is the money to come from? Suppose you pass it, suppose this amendment was the law now by a separate independent bill, the proper way in which I think it ought to become a law, and then suppose this appropriation bill were passed, could the Postmaster-General apply one dollar of the money appropriated by the bill to this purpose? It occurs to me not. It occurs to me the only proper way to do this thing is to pass an act authorizing this contract to be made, and then let the contract be made, and then by an appropriation appropriate the money necessary to execute that contract. That, it occurs to me, is the proper way to do this thing, and I must say that I think that is the very object of the adoption of this rule, if I can understand language.

What is the first clause of Rule 29 so often read? "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill." Gentlemen endeavor to show that that does not apply to this amendment because the term "general legislation" is used, and they say this is specific legislation. With all due deference to gentlemen, that is not the meaning of "general legislation" in this rule. It does not mean a bill covering a whole subject and everything embraced in that subject; but it simply means legislation which is appropriate to be done by regular enactment, by regular authority, authority of Congress. I say, therefore, that whatever may be my opinion upon the merits of this proposition, while I admit there are precedents in abundance to justify the adoption of this amendment as part of the appropriation bill, I think those precedents are wrong;

I think those practices are wrong; and though I may desire ever so much to adopt this measure I cannot do it in this form, and therefore I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate for any length of time on a question of order because I know it is always a very dry subject to debate; but the argument of the Senator from Vermont so entirely narrows the scope of the three rules, 27, 28, and 29, as to render them utterly valueless to the Senate; and if I can have the attention of Senators for a few moments I think I can demonstrate that. If his construction of the twenty-ninth rule be the correct one, then the twenty-seventh rule has no meaning and no practical force; and if the Senate votes upon the question, which will probably be submitted by the Chair, in accordance with the argument of the Senator from Vermont, it really votes to destroy all the privilege which is conferred by the twenty-seventh rule.

The gravamen of the argument of the Senator from Vermont was that it was incompetent under this rule prohibiting general legislation for the Senate to put in anything that did not relate to an appropriation in the bill, that did not relate, in his exact language, to money already contained in the bill. Now let me read the twenty-seventh rule, and of course the rules must all be construed together. The twenty-seventh rule says:

No amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

If it stopped there, there would be some force in what the Senator from Vermont said; but the twenty-seventh rule takes one more step, and it is a large step which covers this case, for it adds:

Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Therefore, a new item of appropriation, an item not at all contained in the money already in the bill, is expressly authorized in the twenty-seventh rule. If you construe the twenty-ninth rule as closely, then, as the Senator from Vermont has construed it, there is no force or vitality left in the twenty-seventh rule whatever, and the privilege that is reserved to committees of this body of moving amendments to appropriation bills is entirely wiped out. That is the objection I make to the construction of the Senator from Vermont.

One point further, Mr. President, I think the rules 27, 28, and 29 are very wisely constructed, and out of long experience in the Senate. They were intended to take from individual Senators on the floor the power to increase an appropriation or to delay the Senate by a motion thereto. They were intended to take away from any individual Senator the right to delay the Senate by proposing general legislation; and it will be observed that nearly all the precedents that the Senator from Vermont quoted in which the Senate made an adverse decision were precedents where the legislation was proposed by a single Senator and not moved from a committee.

Now, legislation upon an appropriation bill, if I may allude to the other branch of Congress, is severely restricted in the House of Representatives; but still it is allowable in the House, as we are at liberty to remark, because their rules are in our own Manual, for two-thirds to suspend their own rules of restriction and put upon an appropriation bill anything they choose. In the Senate we still further restrict, because we say that no general legislation, that is, legislation not in harmony with or in some way germane to the bill, shall be put by anybody, either by a committee or one Senator singly; but we provide that legislation which is germane to the bill, legislation which is relevant—leaving the Senate, if the question be raised, to determine the relevancy—may be moved, not by a single Senator but by any standing committee of the Senate.

The Senator from Vermont spoke also of two clauses in the twenty-ninth rule. I think that the fair construction of the twenty-ninth rule is to take it as one whole. Let me read it:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

These are all repetitions; these are nothing but further definitions, further illustrations of the inhibition contained in the rule; that is, that on a post-office bill you shall not put what affects the Army or the Navy; that on the Navy bill you shall not regulate the post-office; but I maintain that under these rules general legislation, if you so choose to call it, that is relevant, may be moved on an appropriation bill; and I would submit to the Chair, if the question were one to be ruled upon, whether this post-office bill being under consideration here, it would not be competent to entertain an amendment moved by the Post-Office Committee regulating the rates of postage, the Appropriation Committee being duly notified. Of course it would not be relevant to put on here a provision regulating the wages of sailors or the pay of soldiers, or legislation that spread away beyond the limits and confines of the bill; but any legislation which is germane and relevant the Senate reserves to itself the right to consider, if it is moved by a standing committee having the subject in charge. If it gives up that privilege, the Senate has so entirely and narrowly restricted itself on the whole question of appropriation bills that it would have little left to itself except to say yea or nay to any proposition which the House may send here.

The House has power to originate; the House has the power to propose; the Constitution reserves to the Senate the right to amend; but under the restriction which the Senator from Vermont contends for the right reserved to the Senate to amend would amount to nothing whatever.

But, Mr. President, I think the abstract argument does not seem to be needed in the face of this fact. The present rules were reported by the honorable Senator who now sits in the Chair in January of last year, January, 1877. They were approved in the Senate on the 17th day of January as they now stand. On the 21st day of February, the Post-Office Committee reported two amendments as precisely like the one now pending as two peas in a pod resemble each other. They are almost copies of one another. Even to the watchful Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] himself a member of the Committee on Rules and perfectly well posted and skilled in them, it never occurred until the next day that there was a possibility of making a point upon it. Forty-five Senators voted upon it, and it never occurred to them that that was not in precise and absolute harmony with the rules. Even after the question was raised on one amendment on which there might have been some excuse, which the Senator from Vermont pointed out, yet on the second one, the proposition for a line from New Orleans to Rio de Janeiro, if the point could ever be made at all then was the time to make it, and on that the Senate did not even entertain it. So we not only have the rule in its clear and positive meaning in accordance with all the past practice of the Senate, but we have it res adjudicata, we have it absolutely enforced and applied on two amendments of which the pending amendment is almost a precise copy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, because he is so great an authority on questions of parliamentary law, whether I understood him correctly in his construction of the twenty-ninth rule. I understand him to say that any legislation which relates to the subject embraced in the appropriation bill may be attached to it. Now, I want to put this proposition to him: under existing law the mails of this country are carried upon railroads according to the weight of the mail. I ask him whether an amendment which proposed to change the mode of compensation to railroads from weight to the linear measure of the car furnished for the postal service would not be general legislation, and whether that would be appropriate upon this bill to provide appropriations under existing laws?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not the slightest hesitation in answering the honorable Senator from Delaware. I have not the least hesitation in saying that that legislation in my judgment can come within the express provision and purview of the twenty-ninth rule; and I am fortified on that—if my colleague will allow me to refer to him—by my colleague who has so long presided over the Senate and who has been chairman of the Post-Office Committee who agrees with me that that legislation would be entirely in order on this bill. It would be absolutely relevant.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have very great respect for the colleague of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] who has so long served in this body and so ably served on the Post-Office Committee; but I read the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule as follows:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

That is a broad declaration of the rule, without reservation as to the character of the general legislation proposed, and according to my interpretion if the legislation proposed is general, although it may relate to the particular subject considered in the appropriation bill, it is general legislation and is prohibited by this first clause of the twenty-ninth rule. The subsequent clauses of the rule, according to my interpretion, neither modify nor qualify nor in any manner affect the first clause. Each of the clauses of the rule stands by itself unaffected and uninterpreted by anything subsequent or precedent.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, will the honorable Senator, while he is up, be good enough to construe the subsequent clauses of that rule and state to what they apply and what is their meaning?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not consider that I am the best qualified person to interpret the rules of parliamentary law; but it has been a part of my duty in life to construe and interpret the statutes of the State in which I live. According to my interpretation of this rule, the first inhibition against attaching to appropriation bills is contained in the first clause of the rule, and that is that no amendment proposing general legislation shall be attached. Then the next clause is a further inhibition: "nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received." That is the second. "Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto." Here are three distinct inhibitions against legislation upon general appropriation bills: first, that no measure proposing general legislation, relating to whatever subject it may, shall be attached to such bills; second, nothing that is not germane shall be attached to them; third, nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not relate thereto. Here are three distinct inhibitions against the legislation, and neither one of these inhibitions depends upon the others for force and vitality. If the amendment contains either of these matters prohibited, it is not admissible to this bill according to my interpretation.

Mr. BLAINE. If the honorable Senator from Delaware is through, I do not know that I have anything to add. It occurs to me that he did not give quite a lucid reason for regarding those subsequent clauses of Rule 29 as separate and apart from its introduction. It seems to me that there is no particular mode of construing the rule to make it applicable to the practice of the Senate and to the English language, but to take it as one whole. As I said when I began, the narrow construction which the Senator from Vermont applies to it utterly destroys the whole vitality of the twenty-seventh rule. The declaration of the Senator from Vermont that under the twenty-ninth rule no amendment is in order not relating to money contained in the bill, is absolutely contradicted and provided against in the twenty-seventh rule. If I could not show the inaptitude of the construction which he gave by directly arguing on the twenty-ninth rule, I infer it absolutely and undeniably from the fact that his construction of the twenty-ninth rule renders of no effect the twenty-seventh rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the greatest respect for the rulable learning of my friend from Maine; but his proposition last addressed to us is so extraordinary that I must beg leave to reply to it. He says that my construction of the twenty-ninth rule absolutely destroys the force of the twenty-seventh rule, if I correctly understand him. Let us see why. The twenty-ninth rule says that "no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received." I will confine myself to that point now. What does the twenty-seventh rule say? It says that—

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill—

I will stop on that item; one is just as good as going through the whole list of alternatives—> unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

What does that provide? It provides that where this appropriation bill declares that, "for mail depredations and special agents $150,000" are appropriated, nobody shall move to make that $160,000 unless he does it by direction of a standing or select committee; and in addition that it shall be referred to the Appropriation Committee. But that is apart from the necessities of this argument. Does that make my construction of the twenty-ninth and twenty-seventh rules in the least degree inconsistent? Not a bit of it. One is making provisions of law in order to get a chance to spend money, and that is what the twenty-ninth rule commands us not to do. The other is under the twenty-seventh rule, when you have got the provisions of law for spending the money, to say you shall not increase the expenditure stated in the bill unless you do it upon the responsibility of the motion of a committee that presumably has had time and opportunity, and has in fact examined the question. They stand in perfect harmony so far as my humble apprehension goes, Mr. President.

Then my honorable friend says that in order to give the true construction to the twenty-ninth rule you must take it as a whole. I never heard before that a rule or statute of prohibitions, that were, every one of them, in the alternative, must be taken as a whole. You might as well say in a statute against murder, and manslaughter and assault with intent to kill, that you must take the whole section together, the section reading, "If any man shall commit murder, or shall commit manslaughter, or shall assault another person with intent to kill, he shall be punished" so and so. Now, says the logic of my honorable friend from Maine, you shall not punish him at all unless you take that section as a whole and show that he did all three of those things. That will not do, Mr. President. The Senator would be right if this was affirmative and conjunctive instead of disjunctive and prohibitive. But it says, first, no amendment shall be received for general legislation; second, no amendment that is not germane; third, no amendment to an item that does not directly relate to that item. All those are negatives. They might have stood in three separate and distinct rules and would have meant exactly the same thing.

So then I think the error into which my honorable friend has fallen in saying that this must be taken as a whole arises from the fact that it escaped his attention that each one of these was a negative proposition, and therefore disconnected, as it is in the very language of the rule, from the other.

Mr. BLAINE. If that is all the Senator has to say he has not touched the point that I criticised him upon. The Senator has a very convenient way, which of course is skillful, of reading just as much of a statute as applies to his case, conveniently skipping the other parts of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have read the whole of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Not of Rule 27. The Senator read Rule 29. When he came to read the twenty-seventh rule he said that "No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, * * * unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate." The Senator skipped right over two or three very important clauses, but particularly remembered to omit the clause that applied to the argument on which I pointed out what I thought was an error in his position. The Senator stated in his speech of some length this morning that no amendment was in order that did not relate to money contained in the bill. Now, let me read the twenty-seventh rule, and I shall read it all, beginning at the point where the Senator did. I will read from the fourth line:

> And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

There is an entirely new item of appropriation. That refers to money not contained in the bill. That refers to money that it is proposed to put in the bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if this amendment now under discussion, on which the point of order is raised, is an item of appropriation at all?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, contingent.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BLAINE. It is a contingent appropriation, certainly. It proposes to pay a certain amount of money provided something else is done.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It is authority to make a contract.

Mr. BLAINE. And to appropriate money for carrying it out.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. But that provision is to be made hereafter.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the point on which I desire the attention of the honorable Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator shall have it. I did not happen to hear him before; I was out of the Chamber.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator necessitates my now iterating for his benefit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the point now that the Senator has stated it.

Mr. BLAINE. I will repeat another point for his benefit. Of all the cases that the Senator has cited I think a large majority of them were where individual Senators moved the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But always by the direction of a committee.

Mr. BLAINE. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not have any others.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the Senator have all by direction of a committee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. All. No point was made about the others.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, then on that point I was mistaken. One other thing was noticeable. The Senator repeated a very large number of cases. I have not the yeas and nays on which the appeals were taken and on which the relevancy or irrelevancy was decided by the Senate, but I might say that it would be very amusing, I think it would be so proved to us, to find that the Senate divided exactly upon the merits of the case. On a question relating to the civil-rights bill, involving what would be called some radical legislation, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] naturally voted on opposide sides.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken. All but six voted against that amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. On Mr. Sumner's proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the civil-rights bill, Mr. Sumner's amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. On the force bill the Senate divided only on the line of party, and I imagine if you go down through those fifteen or twenty cases the Senator adduced you will find the same Senate dove-tailed in and out according to their wish and view upon the particular amendment. The Senator from Vermont has already referred to the fact that the House, I believe, voted that an amendment increasing the salary of the President was not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not heard of any such fact.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Massachusetts, I beg pardon. But the moment that it was proposed to increase the salary of members it immediately became in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. The difference between meum and tuum.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. It immediately became in order as soon as that was done. In order that we may give just as much line to this case as it will bear, I will repeat another thing for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont, that, according to my construction of the twenty-ninth rule, (and I should like to have his views on that, for the construction of that rule in this somewhat lengthy discussion that it draws out may be of advantage in the future,) it is entirely in order for the Post-Office Committee, by complying with the rule of the Senate, in notifying the Senate of their intention, to change the rates of postage in the United States. It is entirely in order, being relevant to this bill, to do that. It is not in order to change the pay of the Army or to change the tariff or to overhaul the judiciary of the Territories, or to do a thousand and one things outside, but to change the mode of carrying the mails and to change the amount that shall be charged to the individual for carrying his letter or his paper I hold to be entirely within the purview of that rule, if the Post-Office Committee comply with the rule itself in recommending it and referring it in due season to the Appropriation Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I happened to be out at the moment that the Senator made his observations which he says I skipped in reading the rule to get rid of, and therefore I must plead not guilty to any skipping with any such intention. I thought I read all of that part of the rule which related to the point that I was making, and I respectfully submit that I did. I will take up the point that the Senator now makes, that I have heard for the first time.

Mr. BLAINE. That was not my fault.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was certainly not the Senator's fault, although it was his fault to impute to me a disposition to dodge his observation when I had not heard it.

Mr. BLAINE. No; but the Senator skipped four lines in reading the twenty-seventh rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will only let me speak, I will tell him that I never dodge the shot of a gun until I see the gun or smell the powder. I am not so timid as that.

The Senator's point now is, in answer to what I said before, that the Committee on Appropriations or any other standing committee may propose an amendment under the twenty-seventh rule containing an item of appropriation that is not in the bill at all. Grant it. What is that item of appropriation when you look at it in the light of the twenty-ninth rule? It is an item of appropriation to carry out an existing law, just as another part of the twenty-seventh rule says, that has not been provided for. Take this very bill. The existing law provides for the compensation of postmasters. There is a law for that. Suppose the House bill by a mere accident or for any other reasons omitted the item usually contained in this bill to pay postmasters, and there was no provision to pay postmasters at all. What is the Senate committee to do? Why, the Senate committee, not any Senator himself, but the Senate committee, may move an addition to this bill of an item to cover that object of proper public expense that the law requires to be carried out. That answers the twenty-seventh rule and answers my honorable friend. That is the kind of amendment that they make that does propose a new item of expenditure that the bill does not contain. But when you come to the twenty-ninth rule, all that being done and consistently with it, the limit of your power, put in on purpose and put in recently to prevent the nine appropriation bills from drawing to them all the legislation of the country, as they may on the Senator's stated theory, one after the other, is that you shall not legislate except legislating by some mere item, nothing that amounts to general legislation; that you shall not go outside of the subject contained in the bill. It says when you come to changing items that you shall not go out of the relation to that item under pretense of changing an item; and yet it says all the time in the twenty-seventh rule that whatever may be done under an appropriation bill, still made lawful, must be done on the motion of a standing or select committee when it increases an item of appropriation or proposes an item that is not already in. They stand in perfect harmony to my humble comprehension.

But there is some force in what the Senator from Maine says, and certainly he is entitled to judge of it, and he must judge for himself and not for me, that everybody votes upon these questions just as he wishes the result to be. I assume, therefore, that the Senator from Maine on his own statement intends to vote that this is in order for the commanding and sufficient and controlling reason that he wishes this subsidy to be granted. Well, that is perfectly frank; nobody can dispute that. But I must be excused from being put into that category. The Senator will find, different from what he supposes, although he can find many instances where it is too much so—he will find in looking through the yeas and nays of the Senate on questions of order that it has very often happened, more often than otherwise, largely more often than otherwise, that Senators have divided on these questions of order not according to what their desires were as to the merits of the particular proposition in respect of which the question of order was made. It was so in respect of the amendment moved by Mr. Sumner upon the miscellaneous bill of the civil rights bill. Every republican Senator, with perhaps two or three exceptions, was heartily in favor of the proposition proposed by Mr. Sumner, and they afterward enacted into a law through his efficient aid the substance, the general purport of it; and yet only six Senators on the republican side could be found to sustain his proposition that that amendment was in order. So, Mr. President, I think my friend from Maine states too strongly——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not state it as the Senator states it at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I comprehend what language is tantamount to pretty well, and the general purport and effect of the proposition of the Senator from Maine, and it was that as a rule, and he referred to the House of Representatives as one illustration of it, and the civil-rights bill, or the force bill as he afterward styled it as another, that Senators divided on questions of order according to their notions of the merit of the proposition upon which it is raised. I admit that we are led into that too often, but I deny, for the honor and the dignity and the uprightness of the Senate that that is anything like a rule. It is the exception, and when it is the exception it is a mistake.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see the necessity of the remark of the Senator from Vermont. The Senator need not have attempted to introduce any personal thing into the debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not. That is just what the Senator said.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is very skilled in that kind of debate exactly. I was referring to what had been the practice of the Senate; and now I undertake to say, without the Globes or RECORDS here, that there is not a Senator sitting in these chairs who has moved more general legislation to appropriation bills than the Senator from Vermont. I do not happen to have the Globes and RECORDS here, but I have kept a pretty accurate run of what has been done in Congress for the last fifteen years, and I undertake to say that whenever the Senator from Vermont was very intent upon a piece of legislation he did not find a bit of scruple in putting it upon an appropriation bill. If the Senator takes issue on that fact and gives me the time I will bring the RECORD here for him; so that if I applied the argument ad hominem I should say, "Thou art the man." If there be offense in this, the Senator had led in that offense. I did not introduce the instance of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Massachusetts introduced it humorously, with good nature. I referred to that as an illustration; and then the Senator from Vermont gets up here with a sanctimonious air and reads me a lecture upon the independence of the Senate, and he trusts I underrate it, and puts on a lofty air about a practice about which he, if there be evil in it, has indulged as far and as fast as any other Senator has within the ten or fifteen years that he has honored the Senate with his presence.

Mr. President, in this very post-office bill which we are considering, if the Senator from Vermont will cast his eye upon it, he will find that from the forty-fourth line down to the one hundred and fourth it contains absolutely general legislation that is germane to a post-office bill. It makes an entirely new law, as the Senator from Arkansas well suggests, in regard to the compensation of postmasters. It overturns the whole system of the compensation of postmasters of a certain class; and I did not hear that it excited the ire or the opposition or the criticism of the Senator from Vermont. I hold that it is entirely in order, that there is nothing more pertinent in legislation than to regulate the receipts and disbursements of the Post-Office Department when you have the whole subject before you, if you choose to do it through the rules that are framed by the Senate.

I have not said one solitary word about the merits of the amendment of the Senator from Texas. I was somewhat astonished yesterday at a letter being introduced from a British steamship company suggesting to the Congress of the United States that they had vested rights in our legislation and that we had better not interfere. A British agent of New York sends a letter over here to a member of the House of Representatives, which is read in the Senate, suggesting that on the whole we had better not interfere with his rights to navigate between Brazil and New York. He is ready to do all the business for us, he says. I commented on that letter; I commented on this point of order; and when the Senator from Vermont attempts to lecture me on that he had better have recourse to his own ideas of propriety in forecasting and predicting what may be my course upon this measure when it comes up, or inferring that because I am on one side of this point of order I am any more on one side of the merits than because he is on the other side of the point of order he is on the other side of the main question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have just one word to say in reply to my uneasy friend from Maine. I am sorry that he appears to have got disturbed at the simple circumstance that I called his attention to his own observations, which if they appear in the RECORD to-morrow, as I have no doubt they will, exactly as he stated them, every Senator will perceive are entirely just and entirely appropriate, provided I am right in my opinion, and I suppose I am entitled to my opinion. I will not take any issue with the Senator on the question of sanctimoniousness. He may be entirely right about that. But I will take issue with him upon the subject of my previous course, which, without any proof whatever, he says has been in contradiction to what I now maintain. The Senator is vastly mistaken in that respect. We have not had any rule of this kind as a standing rule of the Senate until the last session of the last Congress. We had for two or three years a special rule like this, and during those two or three years I think the Senator will do me the justice to say when he looks it up that he will find that I was among those who were most active and perhaps officious, as he might have said if he had been here then, in making the very objections that I make now, to keep legislation off appropriation bills. My honorable friend, therefore, is mistaken when he supposes that my conduct was otherwise in this respect.

Mr. BLAINE. Anterior to that date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Anterior to that date, my friend says. Then I will reply to my honorable friend by saying that anterior to that date the rules of the Senate permitted any kind of legislation to be put on an appropriation bill; and inasmuch as it was constantly done, sometimes where a high public emergency existed, as my party friends thought, undoubtedly I can be convicted of doing what the rules then allowed, confessedly, of putting some act of legislation, if we wanted it, on an appropriation bill; and if my friend had been here I should have had his aid in doing so.

Mr. BLAINE. Then all the Senator from Vermont means is that as long as everybody was taking a turn at it he had a full share, and when the rule came in and forbade it he began to obey that rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

Mr. BLAINE. And now he lectures all the Senate because they do not look at the rule exactly in the light that he finds it to be a guide to his feet and a light to his walk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the whole of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Now the Senator will permit the rest of us to construe the rule according to our views of propriety.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] is in order under the twenty-ninth rule of the Senate, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR, (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is necessarily absent in Massachusetts, and would be paired if the question had come up on its passage of the measure proposed by the Senator from Texas. I do not know how he would vote on this question of order.

Mr. McCREERY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this measure with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. CHAFFEE.] I do not know how he would vote upon the question of order, but I think he would vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 32; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The bill is in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. CONOVER. There is an amendment which I wish to submit in a few moments which I reported yesterday morning from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I have sent for a copy of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida can offer his amendment in the Senate. If there are no further amendments the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. CONOVER. I shall not offer my amendment.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD BRIDGES IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3268) authorizing the North Louisiana Railroad Company to construct a bridge over the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, Louisiana, and a bridge over the Red River at or near Shreveport, Louisiana, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Commerce, and was postponed indefinitely, be reconsidered, and that it be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsidering the action of the Senate indefinitely postponing the bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe that is the usual motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the vote is reconsidered. The bill will take its place on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1248) for the improvement of the sewerage of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BECK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1249) for the relief of O. H. Perry, administrator of Mary Scott, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1250) to provide for the payment of additional interest upon judgments rendered by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a Senate resolution of April 29, information respecting the terms and conditions under which the surrender of the Cuban insurgents has been made, together with information respecting the future policy of Spain in the government of the Island of Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4704) to retire certain silver coins now in use, and to provide for the exchange of subsidiary silver coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar at the point where the Senate left off in its consideration when the Calendar was last before it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand the next business in order is the bill reported from the Committee on Finance, known as the repeal of the resumption act, upon which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] desires to occupy the floor to-day. That was to be the order after the appropriation bill was disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes it was the understanding that upon the conclusion of the post-office appropriation bill the Senate should resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance, to which the Senator from Indiana refers. It will therefore be regarded as before the Senate, upon which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] submitted a resolution some days since in respect to our relations with Mexico, and notified the Senate that he would ask that the resolution be taken up to-day in order that he might address the Senate upon it. Owing to some casualty resolutions were not called for this morning, and he therefore did not have the opportunity to deliver the address that he wished to make to the Senate. The subject is one of great importance, and according to the universal usage and courtesy of the Senate the Senator ought to be heard to-day. I move to lay aside informally all other matters and to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the Senator from Texas was entitled to the floor to address the Senate upon the resumption bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, then, I shall not press the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After he is through the resolution can be taken up.

Mr. THURMAN. I was not aware of that.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas if he prefers to proceed this afternoon or will he allow us to go to the consideration of executive business? This bill for the resumption of specie payments would be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. COKE. I would prefer to go on now.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, my convictions, as heretofore expressed on this floor, of the utter impracticability of maintaining specie payments under the conditions now surrounding the country, and which must continue for an indefinite time, have, by all the thought I have given the subject, and all the information I have been able to acquire, been riveted more firmly than ever. I have carefully considered the views of Mr. Secretary Sherman, elaborated before the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the House Committee on Banking and Currency, in which the policy and practicability of specie resumption are advocated and maintained by the honorable Secretary with great earnestness, and presume that the arguments so ably presented are at least exhaustive of that side of the question, especially in view of the fact that the advocate was aided on one side by suggestions from members of the two committees who concurred with him, and on the other by those who did not, and presented to his attention arguments requiring refutation. If additional reasons had been necessary to fortify my conclusions on this subject, these discussions would have furnished them so abundantly as to exclude a shadow of doubt. Bearing in mind the recent discussion of the question of remonetizing silver, the great earnestness with which that measure was opposed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury and his coadjutors on the Finance Committee of the Senate, who are pressing specie resumption, one's attention is arrested by the remarkable fact developed in these "interviews," that the much-abused silver dollar is greatly relied on by these same gentlemen as a potent agent for effectuating their resumption policy. They were as earnest resumptionists when bitterly opposing silver remonetization as they are now. The conclusion cannot be escaped, upon a careful perusal of these "interviews," that the aid given in swelling the coin figures upon which the practicability of specie resumption depends, by the addition of silver coin, imparts to the honorable Secretary's arguments the small amount of plausibility they possess. These facts are adverted to because, while placing in a strong light the candor which acknowledges frankly a mistake in opposing the coinage of silver, warn the Senate that on the kindred subject of specie resumption the judgment of these distinguished and able gentlemen is not to be implicitly relied on.

The honorable Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a question propounded by the chairman of the House committee, says "specie payment means the equivalency of gold and paper." He, in the same interview, says, repeatedly, that paper is raised in value and can be brought up with gold by rendering it scarce, that is, by contracting the volume this "equivalency" is to be produced. I have looked diligently through these elaborate "interviews" for some expression of opinion on the part of the honorable Secretary as to the amount of circulating medium necessary to carry on the vast business of the country, and find none—no indication of thought or judgment on the subject. The sole question, deemed worthy of consideration in his mind, seems to be as to some mode of establishing an "equivalency" between coin and paper. The amount of money, whether paper or coin, or both, necessary to place business on a normal and healthy footing, to establish a just compromise between labor and capital, by which one shall live and have hope for the future, and the other a reasonable profit, which shall raise property from its present depreciation to a representation of something like the values invested in it, or the labor and skill required to earn it, which will be sufficient to effect the vast sum of the exchanges of the country, and minister to the wants of the forty-five millions of people in whose interest this Government is supposed to be administered, is not spoken of or adverted to, and seemingly is a subject not fit to be considered in connection with the much-coveted "equivalency" of paper and coin. The stock of coin in the country is the bed upon which the volume of currency must be laid, to the dimensions of which it must be contracted, so that it shall fit and be not too large, whether that coin basis be or not sufficient to maintain the amount of circulation required by the necessities of the country, and regardless of the ruin, the destruction, and suffering it may produce. The business of the country must be reduced, according to the resumption theory, to the capacities of the coin basis, however insufficient that may be. When this basis is threatened with a drain, another turn of the screw, a further tightening of the coil of contraction, is the remedy.

There are other elements, Mr. President, than the mere "equivalency of gold and paper" which enter into the definition of specie payment. I would define specie payment to be a paper circulation, redeemable on demand in coin, sufficient to effect healthfully all the exchanges of the country, maintained at par in public confidence by the presence of a coin reserve ample for its redemption. To contract the currency to one-fourth of the volume required by the necessities of the country, and, by rendering it "scarce" and difficult to procure, produce an "equivalency of gold and paper," is in no sense resumption. The existing substantial "equivalency of gold and paper" produced in this way is heralded by the press and by honorable Senators on this floor as a consummation of resumption. It is to me evidence of the money famine which, like a destroying angel is devastating this country—nothing more.

The practicability of maintaining the business exchanges of this country upon a specie basis, all will admit must depend upon the relative amounts of those exchanges and of the stock of gold and silver to be in the country on the 1st day of January next, and the probabilities of its increase or diminution. Now, I undertake to show, Mr. President, from official figures, and from facts well established in the financial history of this country, that we have not now, cannot have in January next, nor probably within the next decade, a sufficient stock of gold and silver to form the basis of the requisite volume of circulation or to justify the experiment of a return to specie payment. I further undertake to show, from the same character of evidence, that the effort being made to resume specie payment under the existing law is vain, and if not arrested must end in failure accompanied by disaster greater and more wide-spread even than that it has already produced.

I refer, first, to the coin statement of Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint, made up to April 1, 1878, and indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and will premise of this statement, which does not profess to be anything more than an estimate, that Dr. Linderman himself admits it to be possibly an overestimate, while other gentlemen, not such enthusiastic advocates of resumption as the Director of the Mint, and having quite as good means of information, believe his estimate excessive by at least $20,000,000; but his figures will be accepted. According to this official estimate, made on the 3d of April last to the House Committee on Banking and Currency, the sum total of gold and silver coin and bullion in public and private hands in the United States, after allowing for what will be used in manufactures and the arts, is $250,000,000. Of this total, $50,000,000 are estimated to be in "the form of fractional silver, trade-dollars, and Mexican coin, and $1,200,000 in standard silver dollars." The fractional silver amounts to about $45,000,000, and this I deduct from the $250,000,000, because, first, it is not of standard fineness, and not legal tender in sums exceeding $5; and, second, it was designed to take, and has taken, the place of the retired fractional currency, and is and will remain in actual circulation, and therefore cannot be a part of the reserved coin redemption fund. After this deduction, we have left $205,000,000, the total of coin and bullion in the United States at this time, which, if in possession of the banks, would be available for resumption purposes. No one will deny the insufficiency of this stock of coin for resumption and a continued maintenance of specie payments.

From what quarter can we expect to recruit our existing stock of coin? There are three sources relied on by those who oppose a repeal of the resumption law to furnish an additional accumulation of coin. One, the national export trade, through which coin is supposed to be brought from foreign countries in payment for the excess of exports over imports; another, the products of our own mines, and the third, from sales of Government bonds. The last is included in the two first, because Secretary Sherman admits in his House committee "interview," that coin to be brought to the United States cannot be raised by sale of United States bonds in foreign markets and that his sales of bonds will be confined to home purchasers.

An examination of official statistics, covering many years past, will show that any hope of early relief, if of relief at all from these supposed sources of supply, is vain and illusory. The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics certifies a statement of the imports and exports of coin and bullion from 1865 to 1877, which shows a total for the thirteen years of exports over imports of $692,000,000, or an average of $53,264,000 per annum. As evidence that the showing made by these figures is not the result of a transitory and abnormal condition of affairs, I refer to the report of Mr. Secretary Bristow, made in response to a Senate resolution, asking information on the subject, in 1876, which states that for the twenty-seven fiscal years from the 30th of June, 1848, to the 30th of June, 1875, the product of our mines was $1,167,150,000, but that the excess of exports over imports during the same period was $1,211,480,000, which deducted from the mine product left a net increase of $405,670,000, of which he estimated that $150,000,000 had been used in the arts and manufactures, leaving for money purposes, as the saving of that entire period, only $279,670,000. For fifteen years of that twenty-seven our indebtedness was insignificant and held at home, and there was no drain of coin, as now, to pay interest due in foreign countries. If the present indebtedness of the country had existed during those fifteen years with its attendant annual outflow of $100,000,000 of coin to pay foreign interest, instead of an increase of $279,670,000, the excess of coin exports over imports and the product of our mines combined would have been $1,094,330,000.

The only offset to this annual drain from the country of $100,000,000 to pay interest is an average annual increase of about $25,000,000 in the products of our mines. The records of the Government show that for more than thirty years the drain of coin from this country has been constant and ceaseless, and that the average excess of the current of exit over the influx for the three years past is very nearly as great as ever, being an average of $42,396,000 a year, although active preparation has during that time been in progress for resumption, and constant efforts to accumulate coin here for that purpose have been put forth, and although there has been for that period a small balance of trade in our favor; and this balance of trade, small and unimportant as it is, cannot be relied on, for the figures show that it results not from an increased volume of exports, (for this increase is insignificant,) but from a large and striking decrease of imports since 1874, resulting from our impoverished condition and diminished ability to buy. Will returning prosperity restore the old balance which in the past has been almost uniformly against us? I believe, Mr. President, that under the existing tariff legislation, which with its enormous duties forbids an exchange of commodities with foreign countries, it will. Southern markets for manufactures were well-nigh destroyed by the war; the people are now too poor to buy, and the tariff builds a wall against foreign markets, because ships will not carry out our products to return empty. We need foreign markets to swell the sum of our exports. We overproduce for our home market and are shut out by legislation from all others. We need cheaper transportation for the land-locked products of southern and western farms, so that breadstuffs and meats now lying unsalable and valueless in granaries and smoke-houses may find sale in our northern and eastern cities, and to the denser populations of the Old World, where so much wanted. If we will only legislate so as to liberate the products of the country and stimulate productive industry by opening up markets wherein its just reward may be reaped, the volume of our exports will increase and its excess over that of the imports will be established in a steady and constantly increasing stream, which in time will afford ample guarantee for an abundant coin basis for the redemption of all the paper money required to effect the exchanges of the country. If we fail to do this, as surely as effect follows cause, with the first letting-up of the existing stringency and depression the volume of imports will increase and the old balance of trade against us be restored and the annual outgo of coin increased beyond its present large average.

In addition to the inexorable logic of these facts and figures, a still greater obstacle to the accumulation and retention of coin with which to maintain specie payments is found in the bonds of the United States and of the States and of municipal, railroad, and other corporations of this country, estimated at from twelve to fourteen hundred millions, outstanding in Europe, the same which creates the interest drain before referred to. These bonds have a well-ascertained market value in the United States and in Europe, and if, contrary to all the probabilities indicated by the experience of more than thirty years, the outward flow of coin should be reversed, any balance due us would be paid in bonds. It is well known that the specie-paying countries of Europe will not permit the removal of coin in any considerable quantity to the United States. This Government was recently compelled to accept its own bonds for $21,000,000 to its credit in London, and the award of $15,500,000 in favor of the United States at Geneva was settled in the same way. But worse still, Mr. President, not only may surplus exports be paid for in bonds, but the existing stock of coin in the United States, the product of the mines, all may be swept from the country at the will and pleasure of the foreign holders of our bonds. Hear what Secretary Sherman admits on this subject. I read from the report of his "interview" with the House committee:

Mr. EWING. Do you not anticipate that drain?

Secretary SHERMAN. I would expect it. Our production of gold and silver is greater than is necessary to maintain resumption in this country, and it will go to help other countries.

Mr. EWING. Will it not go abroad irrespective of our demand for it here?

Secretary SHERMAN. It depends upon whichever demand is the greatest.

Mr. EWING. And upon whoever has the most ability to keep it?

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EWING. We being the debtor nation, and the people of Europe holding our debts, can they not attract gold from us at present?

Secretary SHERMAN. If we are a debtor nation we are also a nation which the European nations like to have for a debtor. Our nation has been a productive, active nation, and foreign capital seeks a favorite investment here.

Mr. EWING. Still, in case of a want of gold abroad they have it in their power to get it at any time by the sale of our securities.

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes; they can recall it if they want to do so, but the chances are that they will be more likely to invest in our securities in the future than they have been in the past, because this country is a stable country. It has gone through a great civil war, and it has elements of strength and stability which no European country possesses.

Mr. EWING. Our ability to keep gold practically depends upon this, whether our creditors abroad prefer to hold our bonds or to take our gold?

Secretary SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EWING. If they prefer to take our gold they can get it by sending their bonds here and selling them?

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes.

I read again.

Mr. EWING. Of course, if there was an established difference of 1 per cent., or one-half of 1 per cent., between gold and greenbacks, the Treasury would be broken pretty quick.

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes, sir, or a quarter of 1 per cent.; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. EWING. Therefore, after resumption, greenbacks must necessarily be at par with gold so long as the Secretary is able to maintain resumption? Now, I am supposing a case of a drain of gold from the action of foreign creditors, or from any other cause, and want to know what means you would resort to to check it?

Secretary SHERMAN. I do not think that it would be necessary to resort to any means; but if it were necessary to devise some means, I would resort to such as have been adopted in other countries—the temporary suspension of specie payment. That is a question for Congress. The British bank act, which is so often quoted as the standard, makes no provision for suspension; there is no legal suspension of payment in England, nor does our law make any provision for it. If the Government should meet such an adverse state of circumstances as to make suspension absolutely necessary, the Government would necessarily have to take the responsibility of it, leaving Congress to determine whether the circumstances justified it. That has always been so.

If the resumption law is not repealed, the financial policy of the Government will exist solely by the permission of foreign bondholders. By the admission of the Secretary of the Treasury, (and he is the last man in the world who would admit it if a particle of doubt existed about it,) we will be completely at their mercy, and at any time it pleases them a suspension of specie payments can be forced. Specie payments, when once established, Mr. President, cannot be suspended without a shock to all business, a destruction of all credit, a paralysis of trade and industry, and a complete stagnation of all the elements of prosperity. If my pride as an American citizen did not revolt as it does against this domination, I would never, upon considerations of mere expediency, consent that the power to produce that calamitous condition in this country should rest in the hands of any man or set of men, much less in those of a lot of foreign gold-mongers and bond-brokers. Mr. Secretary Sherman says the foreign bondholders will choose not to drain the gold from this country and compel a suspension of specie payments; but it must be borne in mind that this distinguished gentleman has not proved a success as a prophet in matters of finance. He predicted that upon the remonetization of silver gold would go up, and thereupon gold went down. He predicted that bonds would go down, and thereupon bonds straightway went up. He predicted that the new silver dollar would be at a heavy discount, and it went forthwith to par; and, lastly, he said it would seriously embarrass a return to specie payments, while he confesses now that silver is a most valuable auxiliary in advancing his resumption plan.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that both the foreign and domestic bondholders will deal with the bonds with an eye single to their own interests, and we all know that a forced suspension of specie payments, after resumption has been established, would send gold up at once to a high premium, and that all holders of it would reap a rich harvest of profit. The holders of one or two hundred millions of the $800,000,000 of Government bonds in foreign hands can throw them upon our market and exchange them for gold or for greenbacks and demand their redemption in coin at the Treasury, and after exhausting the reserve, make more profit upon the premium arising from a suspension of specie payments in one year than the interest on the bonds will amount to in three; and the domestic holders of bonds have it completely in their power to perform exactly the same operation, and the same inducements to do it. Whatever the bondholders, foreign or domestic, may or may not do, Mr. President, a law which makes them masters of our financial system, which places the yoke upon the necks of our people, leaving them dependent upon clemency and forbearance as the only security against a great calamity, should remain upon the statute-book not one moment longer than is necessary to repeal it.

I have shown that $205,000,000 is the estimated total of all the coin and bullion in the United States, except the fractional silver in circulation and that portion of it used in the arts and manufactures.

I will increase the figures, for argument sake, to $235,000,000, so as to include any possible increase by the 1st day of January next. The Secretary of the Treasury claims that of the existing stock of metal in the country he has in the United States Treasury (including bullion fund of mints and assay offices) April 1, 1878:

Coin		$138,357,608 14
Less coin certificates	$57,883,400 00
Outstanding called bonds	7,305,200 00
Other outstanding coin liabilities	4,643,276 28
Deducting these liabilities from the coin fund in the Treasury we have		68,525,731 86

for resumption purposes. The honorable Secretary, while the above are his own figures, claims $70,000,000 in the Treasury, and this amount will be conceded in the argument, although excessive. By the sale of bonds the honorable Secretary proposes to increase the $70,000,000 to $130,000,000 by the 1st day of January next, and with this says he is ready for specie payment. This amount of coin, if it shall be accumulated in the Treasury, when deducted from $235,000,000, the estimated total to be in the United States on the 1st day of January next, will leave $105,000,000 in the hands of the people and the banks, scattered over all the States and Territories of the Union, two-thirds of it on the Pacific coast, and less than one-third, or about $32,000,000, held now by banks, and to become still less, doubtless, under the pressure for the needed accumulation in the National Treasury.

Now, Mr. President, having seen the state of preparation, not existing now but expected by those who favor resumption, to be reached by the 1st day of January next for resuming specie payment, let us glance for a moment over a few figures which will exhibit in a very striking manner the vast amount of duty proposed to be devolved on a very small amount of coin; and for the benefit of those who lay so much stress on the aid of silver, I will say that up to April 1st there was only $1,200,000 of legal-tender silver coin in the United States, and it cannot be coined faster than at the rate of about $40,000,000 a year.

What does "specie payment" mean practically to the Government, State and national, to corporations, and to the people in the infinitely varied business transactions of daily and hourly occurrence?

It means that $299,240,475 of national-bank notes must be redeemed over the bank counters in United States notes, and $347,848,712 of United States notes must be redeemed on demand at the National Treasury in gold and silver coin, making $647,089,187 of paper to be floated by coin.

It means that $2,100,000,000 of deposits in the banks in the United States must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable on demand in coin.

It means that $878,055,305 of loans and discounts due to national banks must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable on demand in coin.

It means that $1,500,000,000 of loans and discounts due to State, savings, and private banks and to loan and trust companies must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable on demand in coin.

It means that all State, county, municipal, and national revenues and taxes, amounting to $700,000,000, must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable on demand in coin.

It means that the estimated debt of merchants, traders, and manufacturers in the United States of $13,244,000,000 must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the vast annual aggregate of the business of merchants, traders, manufacturers, and insurance companies, reaching figures of enormous magnitude, must be conducted with coin or paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the indebtedness arising out of the dealings with each other of forty-five millions of people, as evidenced by mortgages, deeds in trust, promissory notes, open accounts, &c., reaching an almost incalculable amount, must be paid in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the six billion dollars' worth of products evolved annually from the various forms of industry in the United States must be moved with coin or with paper redeemable in coin.

It means that every marshal, sheriff, constable, lawyer, collecting agent, trustee, guardian, and administrator shall demand and receive only coin or paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the debt of railroad and canal companies in the United States, estimated at $2,650,000,000 principal when due, and annually accruing interest shall be paid in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the $900,000,000, due by counties, cities, and towns in the United States when due, and the annual accruing interest shall be paid in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

It means that the national and State debts, amounting, by estimate, to $2,600,000,000, not already made by contract payable in coin, shall be paid, when due, with the annually accruing interest, in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

In short, Mr. President, it means that every dollar of money used in the vast system of exchange running through the untold billions of value going to make up the sum-total of the great business of the country, public and private, becomes, after the 1st day of January next, demandable and payable in coin or in paper redeemable in coin.

To float this vast mass of values, this sum of exchanges so enormous that the mind tires in the effort to grasp and comprehend the figures which measure it, it is expected that there will be in the United States next January, have the task is commenced, gold and silver coined and uncoined, all told, by exaggerated estimate, only $235,000,000, and of that only $135,000,000 in the Treasury and $32,000,000 in the banks, leaving about $70,000,000 only in the hands of the people.

The honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] so able and so accurately learned in all that pertains to the subject of finance, in a speech delivered in the Senate in April, 1876, after saying that the stock of coin in the United States in 1861 amounted to $300,000,000, and that the population had increased 50 per cent., used this emphatic language:

It cannot be doubted that the bulk of to-day's exchanges in this country is at least double that of a corresponding day in 1862.

Supposing that they are no more than double now, to resume specie payment on the same footing that we stood in 1861, when we had no more coin than was needed, we would require $600,000,000 of coin for the purpose, instead of the $235,000,000 it is estimated we will have if British and German holders of our bonds choose not to take it from us. Besides, Mr. President, we had no annual drain of $100,000,000 of coin from the country then to provide against, nor was the public mind disturbed by the apprehension then that half a dozen foreign gold brokers, some evening over their wine, might conclude to return enough of our bonds to produce a financial collapse. Instead, there was confidence in the solvency of the circulation, resulting not from its scarcity, but from the broad coin basis on which it rested, ample for its redemption, as the volume was sufficient for the business and enterprise of the country.

And this, Mr. President, is the only predicate upon which a return to specie payment can be made. The theory of those who favor resumption, that the stock of coin will be increased, and with it that confidence will return, which will lead to a release of capital from its hiding-places and a consequent expansion of the volume of circulation; if the country was not in debt, if we were not suffering from a heavy annual drain of coin; if our bonds were not in foreign hands, to be sent back we know not when to consume our coin reserves, and therefore a constant menace; if the balance of foreign trade were firmly fixed in our favor; and if our exports when in excess of imports were paid for in coin instead of bonds, would be a sound one. But surrounded as we are with the adverse and insuperable contrary conditions, it is false and utterly impracticable, for no conceivable ground exists upon which to base a reasonable hope of accumulating, within any definite period, a sufficient amount of coin.

If, as I have shown from official figures, we were twenty-seven years accumulating $279,000,000 under infinitely more favorable conditions than now exist, how long will it take us to accumulate $300,000,000 more? for every dollar of it is necessary, in addition to our present stock, to maintain specie payment with the needed volume of circulation. No, Mr. President, we have not the coin, and cannot get and keep it, to maintain specie payment on; and the existing "equivalency" between paper and coin, if sustained on the theory of the resumption law, must be kept up and continued by that same repressive, coercive, relentless deprivation of money, called "contraction," which produced it; and here, Mr. President, I will show the extent to which this "contraction," this rendering "scarce" of the circulating medium has been carried, in order to produce the almost "equivalency between gold and paper," for the country is not aware of the half of it. When the resumption act was passed on the 14th January, 1875, there were in circulation actually—

Legal-tender notes	$382,000,000
National-bank notes	351,861,450
Making a total of	733,861,450

The coin then in the country was not in circulation, as is well known. This total had been reduced, up to April 1, (and reduced further since,) by retirement and cancellation, to $347,848,712 legal-tenders and $299,240,475 national-bank notes, leaving the aggregate nominal circulation $647,089,187. The actual circulation is very far below that figure. According to Secretary Sherman's statement before the Senate Finance Committee and according to the Treasury reports, $220,979,426 of currency, being $84,000,000 in excess of the reserve required by law to be held, has been taken out of circulation and is held in reserve by the National banks, locked up in their vaults, to provide against resumption day. In addition, about $35,000,000 are locked up in the National Treasury for the same purpose; and if to this is added 2 per cent. for loss and destruction in various ways of the original aggregate of circulation, say $14,000,000, the three items aggregate $269,979,426, which, deducted from the nominal circulation, leaves $377,109,761, and no more. The fractional silver which replaced the fractional currency withdrawn is included in those figures. And contraction still goes vigorously on, and the substitute of the Senate committee for the House bill repealing the resumption act permits the Secretary of the Treasury to continue to contract until the 1st day of October, and it is well known he believes that legal-tenders should be reduced to $300,000,000, as required by the resumption law, and that he will have the aid of all the capitalists to reduce the volume to that figure by October.

But, Mr. President, the existing actual circulation is still smaller than is indicated by the figures I have given. I have deducted from the nominal circulation only the currency reserves of the national banks and the National Treasury, but it must not be forgotten that there are other banks besides the national banks, which must be fortified with reserves in order to be ready for specie payment. These are the State, savings, and private banks and the loan and trust companies. The importance of these may be seen in the fact that while the deposits in the national banks amount to $661,575,577 the deposits in these other banks aggregate the enormous sum of $1,500,000,000, or two and a half times as much. There are two thousand and seventy-eight national banks and thirty-eight hundred and twenty-five of the others. The deposits alone in these banks are shown by the Treasury report to be greater than the note circulation and deposits combined of the national banks. These banks hold the little earnings and savings of the great mass of the people—those least able to lose them. Very small sums go to make the vast aggregate of their deposits. They are emphatically the people's banks, as the vast sum of their aggregate deposits shows.

The failure of one-third of these banks will produce more wretchedness and misery and destitution, more vice and crime, deeper and more angry social disorder, than that of all the national banks combined. Two days ago one of the papers of this city stated that in New York City alone seventy-seven thousand depositors have suffered a loss of $7,120,202 out of a total deposit of $11,919,728, through the failure of twenty-one savings-banks since 1871. And it must be remembered that deposits are the most dangerous of all bank liabilities. These banks issue no notes. Their liabilities are for deposits. Unlike bank-notes, which roam in circulation throughout the expanse of the country, certificates of deposit remain at home within easy reach of the bank. There is scarcely a bank in the country two-thirds of whose deposits may not be demanded over its counter on twenty-four hours' notice. Vast as are the interests in keeping of these banks, they are utterly ignored in the resumption scheme; they are not considered in that connection. Secretary Sherman says of them, (I read from the House "interview:")

Mr. EWING. What about the $1,500,000,000 of deposits in other banks than national banks?

Secretary SHERMAN. They are private individual banks; the Government has nothing to do with them.

Mr. EWING. The Government has certainly to consider them in the plan of resumption?

Secretary SHERMAN. It has to consider them just as it has to consider any other public fact.

Are these banks fortified with reserves? If they are not, is it possible that they can fall and not drag down the national banks, and must not specie payment by the National Treasury be suspended as an inevitable consequence? The extent to which these banks are provided with reserves as preparation for resumption cannot be shown with anything like accuracy; but whatever their reserves may amount to, except about $15,000,000 of coin they hold, must be deducted from and still further reduce the volume of currency now outside of the national-bank and National-Treasury vaults which, as we have seen, is $377,109,761. Although we may not know the sum of the reserves held in the vaults of these banks, yet knowing the amount of deposits they hold we do know that according to all the axioms of safe banking they should have reserves at least equal to 30 per cent. of these deposits.

But it is simply impossible, Mr. President, that they can have this per cent., for the reason that the amount, $450,000,000, exceeds all the circulation in the United States outside the Treasury and national-bank vaults by $72,895,239. The failures of these banks for several months past in great numbers, and the accounts which reach us daily now of their collapse in all parts of the country, with increasing frequency, show conclusively the insufficiency of their reserves. While this is true, it cannot be doubted, however, that many of them have provided sufficient reserves; how many, of course, cannot be known, but I will assume that the aggregate of all their reserves is as much as 12 per cent. of their aggregate deposits, less considerably than half enough, which amounts to $180,000,000, and this deducted from the $377,109,761 of circulation outside of the Treasury and national-bank vaults leaves as the actual money circulation of the United States only $197,109,751, or a per capita of $4.17 for the population, when the estimated aggregate of Federal, State, county, and municipal taxation in the United States is $700,000,000!

I honestly believe, Mr. President, that the actual money circulation is less considerably than is represented by these figures, for, in his House "interview," Mr. Sherman stated that in April last there was in New York City, the great commercial metropolis and money center, where all the banks in the country keep large deposits and the bulk of the capital of the country is usually aggregated, only $11,000,000 of legal-tender notes. The currency has been retired and destroyed and hoarded in the bank and Treasury vaults, until but little is left for circulation among the people, and the business of the country lies utterly prostrate under the depletion. But the end is not yet; the dregs of the cup of bitterness have yet to be drained. To-day gold is at a premium of three-eighths of 1 per cent., when Secretary Sherman says, and truly too, that one-fourth of 1 per cent., or less, will produce a "run" on both Treasury and banks which would break all of them, and contraction must go on until perfect "equivalency" is produced and assured.

Why this continued contraction? Why tighten further the coil which has already strangled the energies and hopes of the country and brought her industries to the throes of dissolution, which has reduced thrifty independence to want and stalwart labor to beggary? It is to reduce the volume of circulating medium to the capacity for its redemption, of a coin basis just one-third enough for the requirements of the country. When the day for resumption of specie payment comes will the condition improve? I answer, Mr. President, emphatically, no! The essential, the paramount requisite, the sine qua non, for an improved condition is a greatly more abundant stock of coin, and this we cannot have. We will have our existing stock, if at all, by the sufferance alone of European, aye, and if they permit, then by the toleration of domestic bondholders, for we are at the mercy of either or both. They or either of them can absorb it at pleasure. When did the financiers of Europe fail to grasp all the coin in their reach? Will there be less necessity for keeping bank reserves then than now? Not one particle less, but more and greater. The banks hoard now simply to prepare for resumption, and when resumption is reached they must maintain their same reserves. We have seen that the State, savings, and private banks have but little more than one-third of a proper reserve now. Can they put any of theirs into circulation after resumption commences? The national banks, outside a few cities, are only required by law to hold in reserve 15 per cent. of their deposits, which any banker knows is just half enough to make their depositors safe. Knowing this, the managers of these banks, as Mr. Sherman tells us, have $84,000,000 more of reserve fund than the law requires, and they will be bound to hold it in reserve after resumption as now, because with that they have less than the lowest percentage of their deposits, which any prudent banker would think it absolutely necessary to hold.

The holders of national-bank notes are safe, because United States bonds in the Treasury secure them, but the depositors in those banks have only the 15 per cent. of deposits required by law to be kept, and this is just half of a safe reserve, and the present excess of their reserves over that percentage fails to make up the other half by $50,000,000.

Senators speak of circulation being liberated after resumption commences, and flowing out among the people carrying joy and gladness, driving away gloom and despair. But where is it to come from? It cannot come from the banks or the Treasury, for they are hoarding now what they could at this time do without, but will be compelled to have and keep then. But it is said that confidence will be restored, that everybody will take for granted that all is right, and nobody will want coin and all prefer paper. Whence will come this confidence? It does not exist now. If it did there would be no premium on gold, there would be "equivalency" between coin and paper. This "equivalency" has yet to be produced by further contraction. Will contraction of the currency, until this "equivalency" is produced, generate confidence? I answer that it will, because it will be evident then that the volume of paper has been brought down to dimensions which will enable the coin to redeem it, and this is the only basis for that confidence of which so much is said. But mark you, Mr. President, the volume must be kept at that point. That point has not yet been reached; when it is, by additional contraction, it must stay there, it must not be expanded beyond the coin bed on which it rests; if it is, the "equivalency" is lost and the premium on gold reappears, and a "run" on banks and Treasury closes the scene. Hence, I say that the same means which have produced so near an approach to "equivalency" between coin and paper, to wit, contraction, must be continued to preserve that condition. There must be no letting up of the pressure, no relaxing of the ligature. An enlargement of the volume of circulation and at the same time a preservation of its "equivalency" with coin can only come pari passu with an increase of the coin basis on which it is predicated. But we have seen that there is no hope for any material increase of coin, and, per consequence, none for an increase of the existing volume of the actual circulation, only $197,109,751 or a per capita of $4.17, and to be reduced yet by further contraction. We dare not expand beyond that, because to do it will produce the premium on gold and the inevitable collapse. The Scylla of a circulation, not one-sixth enough for the exchanges of the country, on one side, and the Charybdis of a financial crash on the other if we attempt to enlarge it; and yet we are boastfully told by Senators on this floor that resumption is an accomplished fact, that prosperity and gladness are near at hand, while the country is being tossed in the seething maelstrom of ruin. "Confidence is a plant of slow growth," a great English statesman once truly said; but these gentlemen tell us that the doubt and distrust and uncertainty of the present are, by one wave of the magician's wand, on the 1st day of January next, to be transformed into the most perfect and childlike confidence, that at its beck timid capital will hasten out from its secret retreats and thrust itself into the pockets of the impecunious people of the country; that gold is to be a drug in the market, desired by nobody, while paper is to be clutched with avidity. I would be glad to believe all this, but the truth of history and the recorded experience of mankind forbid it.

No statesman or financier has ever yet invented a process through which specie payment can be maintained without the actual coin. The confidence which is talked about as so important a factor in matters of finance is found always close to the cash, and is always gone when the cash is absent. The two are inseparable; they go or stay together. When it is known that the coin is present and ready, all have confidence and nobody wants it, and when it is not confidence takes wings and everybody demands coin. This is the unvarying experience of the world. Nor can deception be practiced as to the presence or absence of the coin. If it is present the fact is known, if it is not the fact cannot be concealed. The shrewd, sharp men, who grow rich by manipulating coin, will never fail to advertise its scarcity and gather the ensuing premium. Now, a premium on gold of 1, 2, 3, or 4 per cent. gives nobody any trouble. The country, the mass of the people, if they hear of it, give it no attention and are not affected by it. After resumption commences a premium of one-fourth of 1 per cent., or even less, as Secretary Sherman admits, will produce a "run" on the Treasury and the banks which will close and suspend them, will shock the country from center to circumference, will cast down its values, disorganize its industries, unsettle its investments, and fill the country with gloom and misery.

In the facility furnished in the methods of modern sensationalism under the manipulation of rings and cliques for affecting the market values of stocks, currency, and coin lies one of the greatest dangers which will menace the country after resumption commences. A large proportion of our vast indebtedness is held or controlled by those both in Europe and America, whose business and vocation it is to gamble in stocks, in the rise and fall of bonds and gold and greenbacks. Fortunes of almost fabulous proportions have in the last decade and a half been made through the devious processes of these operators. Immense amounts of capital have been concentrated in a few hands, so that combinations of vast sums for the accomplishment of any purpose are easily made. How easy it will be for one of these combinations to produce, through the means and appliances so well understood by them, and so thoroughly at their command, a feeling of uneasiness, or, if you please, a panic, which shall create a premium on coin and lead to a run on the banks and the Treasury, to a suspension of specie payments, to a financial storm in which these trained experts with their ready capital would not fail to add to their already overgrown wealth the stores which the skill of experienced wreckers can gather from the ruin they have wrought.

It is better, Mr. President, that we bide our time and turn back from the frightful abyss of ruin which yawns across the pathway to resumption. The experiment must end in failure, and must engulf the country in a lower deep of misery than it has yet fathomed. The bulk of the State, private, and savings banks, with their vast sum of the people's deposits, must go by the board by reason of the insufficiency of their reserves, and many of the national banks must fall from the same cause. In this general crash the whole system, from the Treasury down, must succumb. It is simply a question of time, for this result must occur, and in my judgment the time will be very short after the 1st day of January next. No Senator on this floor desires more than myself to see the circulating medium of this country bottomed on a sound metallic basis, but I am not willing to sacrifice the interests of the great mass of the people in the effort to reach it, and especially not when it is clear to my mind that the effort will be fruitless. I hold the welfare of the people superior to all other considerations. The Government is theirs; they maintain it, and it should not be used for their destruction.

The great American people, whose servants we are and whose will we cannot rightfully defy, have with overwhelming voice demanded a repeal of the resumption law. The depth and earnestness of the popular feeling on this subject is neither understood nor appreciated in this Capitol. It is not a transitory and temporary feeling, to be appeased with professions or satisfied with expedients. The question of specie resumption has been undergoing discussion among them for three years, and their conclusions are the result neither of prejudice nor passion, but of intelligent thought and of calm and enlightened judgment; and those who imagine they will be abandoned, or that anything less than an enforcement of their sovereign will will put an end to this agitation will find themselves egregiously mistaken. This Government has been administered in the interests of capital, and the millions who produce have been saddled with burdens which have become intolerable for the enrichment of the select few, and burning under a sense of wrong the country is aroused and not to be longer trifled with. If the theory of the Government is not a cheat and a fraud, if the people are in truth sovereign and the source of all power, and if their well-considered judgment on a great question vitally affecting their dearest interests should, of right, be given the force and potency of law, then they have been most grievously sinned against in their own Capitol, and by their own trusted servants, in the failure of this Congress six months ago to arrest the ruin, the distress, and the despair which for two years past has been growing daily and hourly in intensity.

The people have a vivid recollection of the prosperity of the country under an abundant circulation when the policy of contracting the currency commenced, and none of us here have forgotten it. Labor was finding ample employment and an abundant reward, enterprise was daring the chances of every adventure, where skill, energy, and resource could find promise of success, railroads and canals were being projected and built, new mines being opened, new farms being cleared and cultivated, cities and towns being founded and built, new furnaces and manufactories being started and worked, the wilderness of the far West being penetrated, and out of its silent wastes new States and Territories, with hardy, thrifty, adventurous populations, being added to the strength and wealth of the nation, and the South, too, rising from the ashes of her desolation, and with that invincible spirit which in every crisis of her history has marked the character of her people, though stricken with poverty and struggling with every form of calamity, every phase of adversity, was beginning to revive and resolutely preparing to build anew the foundations of prosperity; in short, the industrial activity and material prosperity of the country was simply wonderful.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, for the country, American statesmanship failed to rise to the height of the great occasion. Then was the time to have stricken the shackles from commerce, to have reduced the tariff to the lowest possible revenue basis, to have repealed the navigation laws and the laws for the registry of shipping, to have made the nearest possible approach to free trade in free ships, to have opened the way to every port and every market in the civilized world for the products of American industry, which the commonest sagacity could foresee would shortly glut the home market to which the restrictive legislation referred to confined them. Our lost commerce would have been recovered, our industries have received an additional stimulus, the world have become our customers, and the high prosperity of the period crystallized and perpetuated. The volume of our exports would have swelled into a steady, unvarying excess over imports, and the returning current would have borne back our foreign-held bonds, and redeemed the nation from a foreign financial thralldom, and established an impregnable metallic basis for specie payment. No sacrifice, no contraction, no grinding and crushing between the upper and nether millstone of all the elements of prosperity would have been necessary. The volume of exchanges, if the currency had been in excess, (which was not the case,) would have grown up to and swelled beyond it, and there would have been no stop, no check, no pause in a career of grand progression.

Instead of the sagacious counsels which would have produced these great results, the absorbing purpose of the Government seems to have been to care for the public creditors, first by converting bonds payable in currency into coin obligations, then by demonetizing silver to make them payable in gold with increased value, and this done again to add to their value and to the value of all capital by contracting and lessening the currency, the abundance of which was the great agent in producing the country's surprising prosperity; and thus was the welfare of the great mass of the people stricken down cruelly and relentlessly, their property depreciated in value one-half, their debts doubled, their splendid industries blighted, their enterprise strangled, their present made intolerable, and their future almost hopeless, and the whole country smitten with unequaled calamity, except the favored few whose wealth was fabulously increased. All the legislation was in the highest interest of capital, and most withering and crushing upon the people. The public creditors could have been amply provided for, their bonds secured and as high a premium assured for them as has been established, and the people could have been permitted to be prosperous, the country could have been spared the cruel afflictions it now bears and must continue to bear for an indefinite time. Equal justice and the highest public policy demanded it; but the interest of capital required contraction—that one-half of the volume of money be destroyed in order that its own value might be doubled—and the deed was done. The wrong was and is unparalleled in the immensity of its proportions and in the vastness and enduring character of its calamitous consequences.

The people—the labor of the country, the creators of capital, the architects of all value—have been delivered into the hands of money-changers. Money has been made "scarce," until only they have it, and the people are mendicants at the footstool of their power. When the people had money and were independent and prosperous, and labor and property met capital for exchange on equal terms, we were told this is "inflation," and "contraction" is the remedy. The remedy has been applied—the people have no money, labor begs for bread, property worthless, the country in despair, and capital enthroned king. [Applause in the galleries.] This is resumption, which we are told is an accomplished fact. Those who have done the work complacently look on the result and say, "'tis well done."

But, Mr. President, this is not all. Another great measure has consolidated the power of capital, and placed in its control one great department of the executive branch of the Government, and established under its influence an enormous political power, to be wielded in its own interest, of course. I allude to the system of national banks, of which the National Treasury is the head and government bonds, in the hands of individual or associated holders, the basis. These banks, whose capital consists in bonds deposited in the National Treasury, permeate the whole country and are found in nearly every town, village, and hamlet. They are the depositories of all public moneys outside of the National Treasury, and are the fiscal agents of the Government in distributing its circulating medium.

They are the connecting link between capital and the Government. Each one has more or less its influence with the local press and with those who form or lead public sentiment, and these influences summed up aggregate an overshadowing power, a power wielded solely by the bondholders and capitalists of the country. These national-bank companies were a unit in opposing silver remonetization and are today a unit in opposing a repeal of the resumption law. It is notorious that they contribute largely to campaign electioneering funds and are active political agents. They can combine and dictate terms to the Secretary of the Treasury, and have it in their power in sixty days after the 1st day of January next, if the resumption law is not repealed, to present their legal-tender notes for redemption in coin, drain the Treasury, and produce a suspension of specie payments. The Secretary of the Treasury will not dare antagonize them. On the other hand, the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinate, the Comptroller of the Currency, have great power under the law over the banks. They are mutually dependent. In a contest the Secretary would go to the wall; but neither can afford a contest, and the colossal power of the banks will always secure the favor of the Administration and in return their influence will be wielded for its support. The result of specie resumption will be to crush out the bulk of the State, savings, and private banks, and the whole field will substantially be occupied by national banks; and when it is, the power of the combination will be simply irresistible in the politics of the country and the administration of the Government. This power, although in its infancy, is already a giant in influence, and when it becomes firmly rooted in the soil will dominate every branch of this Government and bend to its all-powerful will every resource and every interest of the country.

The memorable contest which resulted in the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, because that institution was believed to be corrupting in its influence over the Government and dangerous to the liberties of the people, is still vivid in the recollection of some in this Chamber. The reasons which determined the American people then to crush out this monster, as it was called, exist with a force multiplied a thousand times for rooting out the existing system of national banks; and unless the people shall surrender unconditionally the contest yet to be made against its remorseless tyranny will dwarf into insignificance that other contest which only the genius and will of Jackson could lead to success. The two thousand and eighty national banks have on deposit in the National Treasury, in round numbers, $350,000,000 of United States bonds, on which interest is paid semi-annually by the Government. Upon these bonds $300,000,000 of national-bank notes have been issued to them, upon which they pay not one cent of interest, but for the use of which the people pay them 1 to 3 per cent. per month.

Let me illustrate: a banking association in Texas deposits $100,000 of 6 per cent. bonds in the Treasury, receives $90,000 of bank-notes, nets 18 per cent. on the banking business $16,200
Interest on the bonds 6,000

Annual net profit 22,200

This profit is made on $100,000 of bonds, which are being safely kept for the bank in the granite fire-proof vault of the National Treasury, to be redelivered on demand and a return of the $90,000 bank-notes. Resumption of specie payments, by substantially crushing out all competition with national banks and completing the dependence of the National Treasury upon them, is all they need to perfectly consummate the money power as the controlling element, not only in American finance, but in American politics and American government. It is not wonderful, then, that we see in the daily papers each morning, under the flaming caption "Resumption consummated," the announcement that the national banks in this, that, and the other city are paying out gold indiscriminately with paper. They are playing for a great stake, no less than the power to rule this country and people, and the very crisis of the contest is now reached in the staggering blow aimed at the supremacy of capital in the bill repealing the resumption law sent by the House to the Senate, which if it becomes law will be a second victory for the people, as silver remonetization was the first. This is one of the many devices resorted to for its defeat. I make no war upon men, but upon the assumption of right by any class to rule this Government. Bondholders are neither more nor less honest, more nor less patriotic, better nor worse citizens than other men. Every dollar, principal and interest, of their bonds should be and will be paid according to the letter and spirit of the contract, justly, honestly, and liberally interpreted. This is all they can ask and all that ought to be conceded. I am not willing that they shall have exclusive privileges; I desire to see a complete divorce of this Government from all class interests, and the common interest and general welfare of all the people, in all the States and Territories of the Union the sole object of its legislation and administration, which is impossible with the existing banking system and system of national finance under the control of a favored class.

If, Mr. President, as we should at once, we will make United States legal-tender notes receivable for customs dues, they will be convertible at par with gold, performing, as they will then, all the offices of gold; and if in addition, as we should, we pass the House bill repealing the resumption act unconditionally and take away the power to contract the volume of currency further, there being no paper to be redeemed, all the hoarded coin and currency in the country will be released from prison and go out into circulation. Then the only reserves necessary to be kept in the banks will be enough to secure deposits. The aggregate of coin and currency, as it now stands, without further contraction—about $850,000,000—would, less deposit reserves, be available for the circulation of the country, as it is not now and cannot be if specie payment is resumed. While this amount would not be sufficient for healthy business by $350,000,000, yet it would be a vast improvement over the present condition, and the country would at once feel its beneficial effect.

Twelve hundred millions of dollars are needed in this country to secure bank deposits and furnish a sufficient circulation. A larger volume than this was in circulation in 1865, when the policy of contraction was practically inaugurated, and at that time there was no circulation at all worth mention in twelve States of the South, and since that time Colorado and Nebraska have grown from Territories and been admitted as States, and a territorial government has been erected in Wyoming. The population of the United States then, by the best estimates, did not exceed thirty-five millions, while estimated to be forty-five millions now, and the exchanges of the country are doubtless doubled, or would be under healthy conditions. This would give our people a per capita of $26.30—less than the per capita of Germany and England, and but little more than half that of France. The country demands at least that amount, and will have it. Agitation will go on until it is furnished.

The remonetization of silver was only the beginning of the financial reform demanded by the times. The dogged and persevering obstinacy with which class interests contest every inch of ground evinces the high estimate placed upon the advantages they hold, but the determination of the people is fixed and unyielding that their will shall be the law of this Republic, and the common welfare of all, rather than the enrichment of a few, the purpose and aim of this Government; and I say, God speed them success, and succeed they will.

The democratic party went before the people of the United States in 1876 upon the platform adopted in national convention at Saint Louis which pledged a return to specie payments at the earliest practicable moment, but denounced the resumption law as utterly impracticable, and declared an unyielding purpose to repeal it, and upon this explicit declaration was indorsed by a popular majority of over a quarter of a million. Every democratic State convention since then assembled south of the Potomac and west of the Alleghanies, so far as I know or believe, has indorsed that pledge and demanded a repeal of that law. Still later and up to this day, by all the means through which public sentiment can manifest itself or the popular voice be heard, the same demand has come from the people of the sections named regardless of party. For one, so far as my vote and voice can do it, the pledge of the democracy shall be redeemed and the will of the people made the law.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the act approved January 14, 1875, requiring the resumption of specie payments on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, is one of a series of measures which seemed to have been conceived, perfected, and enacted for the sole purpose of fostering and promoting the interests of capital at the expense of the labor and productive industries of the country.

The act approved February 25, 1862, which authorized the issue of legal-tender notes and the issue and sale of certain bonds of the United States, may be assumed to be the beginning of our bonded debt; and in order that the rights of the Government and its creditors may be the better understood I will quote at some length the act under which the bonds were issued and sold. Among other things it provides—

> That such notes [greenbacks] herein authorized, shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest on bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid. And any holders of said United States notes, [greenbacks,] depositing any sum not less than $50, or some multiple of $50, with the Treasurer of the United States, * * * shall receive in exchange therefor duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States * * * bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from the date thereof.
> And such United States notes [greenbacks] shall be received the same as coin at their par value in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and may be reissued from time to time, as the exigencies of the public interest may require.

By the express words of this act every bond issued by the Government which did not by its terms stipulate for payment in coin was payable in legal-tender notes; and the right to redeem the 5.20 bonds, "at the pleasure of the United States, after five years from the date thereof," in legal-tender notes is too clear to admit of doubt or debate.

This was the well and universally understood law of the contract under which and the acts amendatory thereof the 5.20 bonds were issued, amounting to more than $1,500,000,000, and paid for by the bondholders in greenbacks at par when the coin value of the greenbacks ranged from fifty to seventy-five cents in the dollar.

By this act, the Government proposed to exchange these bonds for greenbacks at par, binding itself to pay interest upon the bonds in coin at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, for five years, but in express terms reserving the right to redeem them in greenbacks at the expiration of five years from their respective dates. When this proposition was accepted the greenbacks paid and the bonds received, the contract was complete, and all that the bondholders had a right to demand or expect, all that the highest and most delicate sense of honor and good faith could require of the Government, was to perform its obligations according to the letter and spirit of the contract.

Why did the Government reserve the right to redeem these bonds at the expiration of five years from their date? Such reservation certainly made them less desirable as an investment and diminished their market value.

The only possible value of this reservation is to be found in the fact that it put it in the power of the Government to stop the interest upon this immense debt at that time and thereby save to the tax-payers of the country over $90,000,000 per annum.

But instead of relieving the staggering and almost prostrate industries of the country of this great burden by the exercise of this reserved right to redeem these bonds, under the false pretense of "settling conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws" under which the bonds were issued, and without the slightest benefit or advantage to the Government, and wholly without consideration good or valuable, the act approved March 18, 1869, was passed, which provides:

> That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations, * * * except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Now, was it true that there were, or could have been, "conflicting questions and interpretations" as to the spirit, meaning, and legal effect of the act of February 25, 1862? The ingenuity of the human brain, however severely taxed, cannot employ language more explicit and plain than the language of that act; its intent and meaning is so obvious as to positively exclude all ambiguity or uncertainty. The total absence of necessity for legislation to explain that act, or settle the rights of contracting parties under it, forces us to the conclusion that the sole object and purpose of the act of March 18, 1869, was to change the contracts which had been made under the act of 1862, and which by their express words were payable in legal-tender notes, into contracts which deprived the Government of the right to redeem the 5.20 bonds in five years except in coin, and which compels it to pay to the bondholders coin instead of greenbacks upon at least three-fourths of the public debt. There are reasons, abundant and potent, why the bondholders should have desired to change their contracts which were payable in non-interest-bearing greenbacks to contracts payable in coin, because such change must greatly enhance the market value of their bonds.

But exactly why the Government should desire or consent to such change is what the overtaxed and toiling millions of the country cannot so readily comprehend.

Yet, so far as an act of Congress could substitute the one contract for the other it was done, the profits of which to the bondholders and the increased burdens to the tax-payers may be safely estimated at not less than $500,000,000.

But this attempted change of contract, existing only in legislative enactment and resting upon no consideration, good or valuable, was not beyond the reach of repeal. Therefore the bondholders did not feel entirely secure in the immense profits promised by the change.

Hence it was followed by the act approved July 14, 1870, which authorized the issue and sale of $1,500,000,000 of new bonds, principal and interest payable in coin, two hundred millions of which are to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent.; three hundred millions at the rate of 4½ per cent., and the balance at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; these bonds to be sold for coin at not less than par, and the coin to be used in the redemption of the 5.20 bonds, or the new bonds to be exchanged, dollar for dollar, for the 5.20 bonds; and this, too, when it was known that Government, States, counties, cities, private corporations, and the whole people were more oppressed with debt and exorbitant taxation than ever before, and when the contraction of the volume of currency was crippling our commerce, paralyzing our manufacturers, and prostrating the enterprise and productive energies of the whole people. At a time and under circumstances which, by every consideration of sound policy and duty to an oppressed and struggling people, demanded that contraction should be arrested by redeeming as rapidly as possible the 5.20 bonds in greenbacks, to the extent that greenbacks were authorized to be issued, which would not only have stopped interest to that extent, but would have inspired new life, vigor, and hope in the hearts of an almost despairing people.

Great merit is claimed for this measure, because of the reduction of interest from 6 to 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. But the toiling men and women of the country who, by the unnecessary and unjust exactions of the Government, are reduced to the necessity of struggling from day to day for a precarious existence, will not forget that under the law of the contract it was the right and, as I maintain, the duty of the Government to have redeemed the 5.20 bonds in greenbacks as rapidly as the amount of greenbacks authorized by law would permit at the expiration of five years from their respective dates, and relieved the tax-payers of this burden of over $90,000,000 a year. But it is said that good-faith and national honor forbade it.

Throughout the history of the world there has never been a usurpation or an act of great oppression and wrong inflicted upon a people that the honor and good-faith of the nation has not been appealed to for its justification.

In what age of the world, and in what country, has the honor or credit of a debtor suffered who performed the obligations of the contract in letter and spirit? American honor is too well established to be so easily alarmed and American credit too substantial to suffer injury by such false and sentimental sophistry, however loudly and constantly it may be dinned in the public ear. But the refunding act was passed, and the work of contraction goes on with its legitimate harvest of commercial and business failures, day by day, week by week, and month by month. Under these acts capital congratulates itself upon its newly and wrongfully acquired right to demand from the Government coin upon all of its obligations.

Not content with this, but encouraged and emboldened by recent and signal successes, the next demand in its greed of gain and selfish exactions was the demonetization of silver, and in obedience to the demand, by the fifteenth section of the act approved 12th February, 1873, this additional and almost fatal concession was made, not only to pay all obligations in coin, but to strike down and destroy the money quality, the legal-tender power of one of the precious metals, thus reducing the legal-tender coin of the country about one-half and diminishing the ability to pay in the same ratio. It would seem that the cupidity of the most avaricious should have been satisfied, if not sated, by the ready submission to these various and exorbitant exactions. But no; the resumption of specie payments will still further contract the volume of currency and increase the purchasing power of money, still further reduce the value of labor and property.

This, too, was demanded. And by the act approved 14th January, 1875, conceded, which act, among other things, provides that—

Whenever, and so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any banking association increasing its capital or circulating notes, or any newly organized bank, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued, * * * * and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued, until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender notes, and no more.

And on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption. * * * And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption * * * he is authorized to use any surplus revenues in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of 14th July, 1870.

This act not only requires further contraction upon the part of the Government, with the necessary increase of all the evils, bankruptcies, and ruin that contraction has already produced, but requires the sale of interest-bearing bonds for coin, with which to redeem non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes. This requirement is an admission, in the face of the act, that the Government was not, and recognized the fact that it would not be, on 1st January, 1879, in condition to resume and maintain specie payments.

In addition to this, resumption makes it necessary for every bank in the country to demand payment from its debtors, withhold loans and discounts from its customers, and hoard its resources to be in condition to maintain specie payment.

The experience of all nations proves the great evil of sudden contractions and expansions in the volume of currency, and that the most effective, if not the only, remedy is to require the circulating medium to be based upon and convertible into coin, at the will of the holder.

And while I hold it to be the duty of the Government to adopt this as its settled and permanent policy, I deny that it can do so at this time, without utter ruin to the industrial interests and general business of the country.

The exigencies and necessities of the war not only justified but compelled the Government to issue and put in circulation greenbacks, a paper currency, to an unprecedented extent, an amount many times larger than all the coin in the country could redeem, producing the highest state of inflation that ever existed in the history of the country, rendering specie payments utterly impossible.

Every consideration of sound policy demanded that the process of reducing this immense volume of currency to the proper standard, to the redeemable point, should be slow and gradual, depending, to a great extent, if not entirely, upon the returning prosperities of the country.

Arbitrary legislative enactment cannot increase the production of the precious metals or bring them from other countries to this, nor can it secure the payment of coin more rapidly than coin can be obtained. These metals can be obtained only from our mines and by the production and exportation of such staples and commodities as will bring them from other countries.

It is impossible for Congress to anticipate and fix with any degree of certainty the time at which the production of precious metals in our mines, or the production of those staples and commodities which command coin in other countries, will enable the Government to resume and maintain specie payments; yet, while the act requiring resumption remains in force, day by day it leads to further contraction, and contraction has already produced almost universal bankruptcy and ruin throughout the whole country. I therefore insist upon repeal, not only of that part of the act which fixes a day for resumption, but also those parts which require the redemption of legal-tender notes in the ratio of 80 per cent. of the bank-notes issued, and especially that part which authorizes the sale of interest-bearing bonds for coin with which to redeem non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes.

Repeal the act, and the whole act, and let resumption come when the returning prosperity of the country shall make the maintenance of specie payments possible.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, these are not the only evils growing out of class legislation of which the people have cause to complain. There are other abuses and wrongs of a kindred character under which the people have suffered and still suffer, from which they demand and are entitled to relief, to one of which, now pending in the other end of the Capitol and, in the form of a declaratory resolution, pending here, I propose, with the indulgence of the Senate, briefly to refer. For the last sixteen years you have maintained a high protective tariff, under which the whole people are taxed upon almost every article used or consumed by them at the average rate of 44 per cent., under the pretense of raising revenue, when the duties are so high upon some articles as to prohibit importation altogether, while upon many other articles importation is discouraged and greatly diminished by the excessive duties imposed, cutting off revenue altogether in the one case and reducing it in the other, while the tax upon the consumer is increased, because to a great extent he is compelled to buy from the home manufacturer, who is protected to the extent of the duty imposed and who fixes the price at that much more than he could sell for if the foreign article was allowed to come in competition with his; but the foreign article comes in competition with the home manufacturer encumbered with the cost of transportation from a foreign country and the amount of the import duty imposed, thus enabling the home manufacturer to add to the price of the article the amount of the duty (which under the present tariff averages 44 per cent.) and undersell the importer at least to the extent of the cost of transportation.

Under this system the consumer pays the duty as well upon the home manufactured article as upon that which is imported. The duty paid upon the imported article goes into the Treasury, while that paid upon home manufactured goods goes into the pocket of the manufacturer.

It is safe to assume that at least four-fifths of the articles consumed by the American people are of American manufacture and only one-fifth imported; hence under this system the people have to pay a bounty of at least $4 to the manufacturer in order to get $1 into the Treasury.

To illustrate, I quote from a speech of Mr. BURCHARD, a republican Representative from Illinois, delivered in 1872, advocating the reduction of duties upon some leading articles, Mr. BURCHARD being then as now a member of the Committee of Ways and Means and distinguished for his accuracy in commercial and manufacturing statistics. He said:

The reductions in the bill of the duties upon but six classes of manufactures lessen the revenue not quite $10,000,000, but lighten taxation $54,000,000. A comparison of the domestic production with the imports will show as follows:

Articles.	Reduction of revenue.	Reduction on cost of domestic production.
Salt	$615,522	$1,175,000
Leather	329,258	3,890,000
Iron	2,135,223	10,583,000
Steel	745,530	1,736,000
Woolens	4,967,452	23,000,000
Cottons	788,724	5,000,000
Total	8,781,718	45,333,000

This table shows that upon these six articles, which every citizen, however poor, must consume, and consume to an extent equal to the largest capitalist, a bounty is paid to the manufacturers of more than five times as much as the revenues which are collected upon them. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, $130,956,493.07 were collected from customs.

Now, if the consumption of other home-manufactured articles bears the same proportion to similar articles imported that the six articles already mentioned bear, we may approximate the amount of the bounty paid by the whole people in the last fiscal year to the comparatively small number of capitalists who are engaged in manufacturing by multiplying the amount of revenue collected by five, which shows—

The bounty to be	$654,782,465 35
Add to this the revenue collected	130,956,493 07
And it makes the sum of	785,738,958 42

which was under the present tariff system drawn from the pockets of the people in order to put $130,956,493.07 into the Treasury.

However clear may be regarded the constitutional power of Congress to impose a tax upon imports for the purpose of raising revenue necessary to support the Government, I deny the constitutional power to impose or increase the amount of such tax for the purpose of protection.

The object and purpose of a tariff law must be revenue, and in every instance where the duty is increased above the strict revenue point for the purpose of protection it is a usurpation of power to subsidize one industry at the expense of all other industries; to foster and enrich one small class at the expense of all other classes.

The whole system in its operations is unequal, unjust, and oppressive, because it extorts four or five times as much money from the people under the name and pretense of revenue as the amount of revenue which the Treasury actually derives from it, and builds up and enriches a single industry at the expense of every other industry and every other interest in the country. Yet, unjust as it is, in view of the present necessities of the Treasury, it may not be wise to abolish it. But every consideration of justice and sound policy demand that the duties should be reduced at least one-half, and adjusted with a view to revenue, rather than protection, and as far as may be in favor of those least able to pay.

Every citizen should contribute to the revenues of his Government in proportion to the extent of the interest he has to be protected by it, and in proportion to their respective abilities to pay. A tariff reduced and adjusted as suggested would in my judgment produce almost if not quite as much revenue as the present high protective and almost prohibitory tariff produces and relieve the people of more than half of the immense burden it imposes and give to the home manufacturer incidental protection to the extent of about 20 per cent., which with the natural advantages this country affords will in my opinion enable him to compete successfully with all the nations of the earth. But whether this be true or not, the manufacturer cannot justly demand more protection than a strictly revenue tariff will give, cannot expect, and should not desire that the burdens of the whole people should be increased to pay him a bounty.

Justice and sound policy demand that these evils to which I have referred, should be effectually and speedily remedied. Under these exorbitant and unjust exactions, and this policy of continued contraction, property has not only greatly depreciated in price, but has almost ceased to have a convertible value, and labor finds little employment, and, when employed, no adequate reward.

The measures referred to have day by day increased the burdens of the people, while day by day they have diminished their ability to pay, robbed labor of its earnings, and reduced honest industry from comfort and independence to penury and want.

If this policy is persevered in, it will not only perpetuate the almost universal discontent now prevailing, but rapidly popularize the idea of repudiation, murmurs of which are already not unfrequently heard. No greater calamity could befall the country than the stain of repudiation, a calamity which you, Mr. President, and all of us must deplore. And if we would avert it, and the possibility of even greater evils, we should not forget that a people taxed beyond their ability to pay, and under a system which is unequal and unjust, and by the exactions of that unjust system find themselves reduced from comfort and independence to poverty and want, may easily fall into the error of repudiation, while the more restless spirits may possibly be driven into the more fatal errors of bread-riots, labor-riots, and the lawless demands of the commune.

Abolish every act of class legislation; and while we carefully protect the equal rights of all we should as far as possible promote the interests of the largest numbers. All of our prosperities, depending as they do upon the productive industries, agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and mining, these great interests should be fostered and encouraged in every legitimate manner and by every legitimate means, for when they prosper all other interests prosper and when they languish or fail all others languish or fail with them; but neither one of these great interests should be fostered at the expense of the others.

The following table, taken from the report of David A. Wells, special commissioner, &c., shows the comparative values of the products of agriculture and manufacturing. Mr. Wells says:

A summary statement of the values created by the leading industries of the country would appear to be substantially as follows:

Agriculture	$3, 282, 950, 000
Cotton manufacture	71, 500, 000
Woolen manufacture	66, 000, 000
Iron production, pig and bar	119, 950, 000
Leather manufactures	222, 600, 000
Railway service	360, 000, 000
Fisheries	100, 000, 000
Total	4, 223, 000, 000

This table shows that the value of agricultural products is about seven times as great as all the manufactures of cotton, woolen, iron, and leather, which constitute the great bulk of American manufactures. Agriculture being the great and paramount industry of the country, not only in respect to value of products, but also in respect to the numbers engaged in it, it is and must always be the business of at least three-fourths of the American people, and has the highest claim to the fostering care of the Government.

The interests of agriculture can be best promoted by relieving it of unjust burdens and opening the markets of the world to its products, encouraging commerce by taking off restraints as far as possible and securing to agriculture abundant and cheap transportation. Every tax upon imports is a restraint upon commerce, diminishing importations, and necessarily diminishing exportation in something like the same ratio, because, if we cannot afford to receive the products of other countries in exchange for ours, they cannot afford to purchase ours to the extent that they otherwise would. Hence, the tendency of every tax upon imports is to close the markets of the world to our products, and the higher the tax the greater the tendency.

But I do not propose to discuss the tariff question at this time, and have only referred to some of the evils growing out of the present tariff which in my judgment demand prompt action, thorough revision, and remedy.

The old time-honored silver dollar has been restored to its rightful place as one of the legal-tender coins of the country, giving its quantum of aid to swell the volume of currency and check the evils of contraction. But the relief from this source is wholly inadequate to the present pressing necessities and demands of the country. Repeal the resumption act and require legal-tender notes to be received in payment of duties on imports as well as all other dues to the Government. Levy a fair and reasonable tax upon incomes; reduce the tariff duties to the strict revenue standard; abolish the tax on the circulating notes of State banking associations; reduce public expenditures as far as possible and consistent with efficient administration, and we may reasonably hope to see, at no distant day, thrift, prosperity, and independence take the place of the stagnation, poverty, and want which now pervade the country.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make a report in executive session.

Mr. SARGENT. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. There are some reports that ought to be made. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Before that motion is put, I desire to ask the Senate to set aside all other orders and take up the resolutions I had the honor to present a few days ago, so that I may be able to discuss them to-morrow.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it only for the purpose of discussion? The Senate is too thin now to assign any measure for consideration, but if the Senator desires to speak on the matter to-morrow nobody will object.

Mr. VOORHEES. In that connection I desire to give notice that at the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow I will move to set aside this bill as unfinished business for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Alabama to make the speech he desires to make on the subject that he has in view, and after that I shall insist upon the Senate adhering to the unfinished business until a vote is taken; that is, the subject which has been before us this afternoon.

Mr. BAYARD. Let the subject which the Senator from Alabama desires to discuss be taken up now so as to be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move, then, that the bill in regard to resumption be laid aside in order to enable the Senator from Alabama to address the Senate to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour with the understanding that the unfinished business shall then be resumed.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no necessity whatever for that motion. Let it be by general consent laid aside informally—that is our custom—and let the Senator from Alabama proceed to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. Let this bill remain the unfinished business and to-morrow at one o'clock let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. VOORHEES. I only desire to give notice that I shall not consent to allow the unfinished business, which is the consideration of the bill reported by the Finance Committee, to be laid aside except for the accommodation of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resumption-repeal bill and, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, it can be laid aside temporarily for the purpose named.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 14, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BACON. I rise to correct the Journal. Yesterday, on the call of the House, my name was called and I answered. A page was sent to me and I replied that I had answered to the call of my name. To make the matter entirely certain, I went to the Clerk's desk and the Clerk said it was all right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's name is recorded in the Journal.
Mr. BACON. It is recorded among the absentees on the roll-call.
The SPEAKER. Ah! it is not down on the roll-call on the call of the House.
Mr. BACON. But I was here and answered to my name.
The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman referred to the roll-call upon another question.
Mr. BACON. No, sir; I refer to the call of the roll on the call of the House.
The SPEAKER. The correction of the Journal will be made.
The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the regular order.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I insist upon the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the pending question is upon seconding the previous question upon the resolution offered by Mr. POTTER yesterday.
Mr. HENDEE. I ask unanimous consent——
Mr. FOSTER. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.
Mr. POTTER. I shall be happy to yield for anything that should be done by unanimous consent as soon as gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are willing to attend and make a quorum; but to yield to their determination to count out the House whenever there is business pending which they do not like and to make a quorum only for the business they wish considered is something we cannot assent to. It is something not only factious but unprecedented and revolutionary.
Mr. FOSTER. Very well; have it your own way.
Mr. HALE. We must have the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question upon seconding the call for the previous question on the preamble and resolutions submitted yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]
The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 102, noes 0.
Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.
Mr. WOOD. Let us have tellers.
The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers; there is evidently a quorum present in the House.
Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. POTTER were appointed.
The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 111, no 1.
Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.
Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE moved that there be a call of the House.
The motion was agreed to.
The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and also called the list of absentees; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich,	Ellsworth,	Killinger,	Robinson, Milton S.
Bagley,	Errett,	Landers,	Sapp,
Baker, William H.	Freeman,	Loring,	Stephens,
Ballou,	Frye,	Money,	Townsend, Martin I.

Carlisle,	Hazelton,	Quinn,	Willits,
Clark, Rush,	Hunton,	Rice, Americus V.	Wren.
Clarke of Kentucky,	Jorgensen,	Roberts,
Ellis,	Ketcham,	Robertson,

During the call of the roll,
Mr. MANNING said: If it is in order I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. MONEY, is absent by leave of the House.
The SPEAKER. Such announcements are not in order at this time. The call of the roll shows that 246 members have answered to their names and that there are 46 absentees. A quorum is present.
Mr. POTTER. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, there being a quorum present.
The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question.
The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 113, noes 0.
Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.
Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How is it possible for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to raise the point of order that no quorum has voted, when he himself did not vote?
The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the gentleman to determine, not for the Chair.
Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. POTTER were appointed.
The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 113, no 1.
Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.
Mr. WOOD. As the factious minority seem determined to obstruct all public business, I move that the House now adjourn.
Mr. GARFIELD, (amid cries of "Order!" "Order!") I hope the adjournment will be delayed until a resolution is received from the Senate in relation to attending the funeral of the late Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution.
Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 105, not voting 56; as follows:

FUNERAL OF PROFESSOR HENRY.

During the roll-call, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives respectively adjourn their several bodies at four o'clock on Thursday, the 16th instant, for the purpose of enabling Senators and Representatives to attend the funeral of the late Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER, (when the roll-call as above recorded was concluded,) said: Before announcing the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn, the Chair asks unanimous consent to submit a communication from the Chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution in relation to the death of the late Professor Henry. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, May, 14, 1878.

SIR: I am requested by the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to inform you, and through you the House of Representatives of the United States, of the death of Professor Joseph Henry, the Secretary and director of the institution, which occurred in this city, on Monday, May 13, at 12.10 p. m. His funeral will take place at the New York avenue Presbyterian church, on Thursday, May 16, at half past four o'clock in the afternoon, and the House of Representatives is respectfully invited to attend.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. R. WAITE,
Chancellor Smithsonian Institution.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution just received from the Senate on this subject be taken from the Speaker's table and considered.

There being no objection, the resolution was taken up, read, and unanimously concurred in.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the Chair announces the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn will he permit me to ask unanimous consent that there be a session of the House this evening for debate only?

Mr. BLACKBURN and others objected.

Mr. KELLEY. Then to-morrow evening.

Mr. EDEN. Wait until to-morrow, and we can tell then whether we shall object or not. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced as above recorded; accordingly (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. GARTH: The petition of Francis M. Grace and other citizens of Lawrence County, Alabama, for the passage of House bill No. 1670—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. PRIDEMORE: Papers relating to the pension claim of Elisha Franklin—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of Potomac Council, No. 8, of the District of Columbia, Sovereigns of Industry, for a law securing the full weight of coal to purchasers—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of 1,419 citizens of Delaware, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 20) to extend the scope and efficiency of an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain"—to the Committee on Public Lands.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 15, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present a petition of citizens of Petersburgh, Virginia, signed by the mayor of the city and a number of prominent citizens, urgently requesting that the Government "recognize and in part reward the past services and honorable career of General James Shields in the defense of our common country in its time of need, by placing him on the retired list with rank, &c., as set forth in the bill which lately passed the House of Representatives." As the bill has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I present a petition which was handed to me a few moments ago with the request to present it, of Mr. Hugh Coyle, of the city of Washington, praying that Senate report No 572, second session Forty-fourth Congress, relating to a form of government for the District of Columbia, be reprinted for public distribution, and protesting against the passage of the bill providing a government for the District of Columbia as it came from the House. The petition requests also that this petition be read. I do not know whether it is right or not to have that done. I present the petition according to his request without knowing what is in it, as I have not had time to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition is presented by request and will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. If there is no objection I should like to have it read. I do not know myself the entire contents of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to its being read?

Mr. INGALLS. I think unless the Senator from Kentucky is able to vouch for the contents of the petition it ought not to be read.

Mr. BECK. I am not able to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the petition cannot be read.

Mr. SARGENT. Are we to understand that the citizens of Washington, or some part of them, petition against the Government of the United States paying a reasonable share of the expenses of this District? If that is so, Senators representing distant States may be disposed to follow their advice. It seems to me a very unpatriotic move on the part of any citizen of this District to object to the United States Government paying its due proportion of the taxes or expenses of this District. If they object to other things in the bill, of course there are features of the bill on which the committee may be disposed to agree with them.

Mr. BECK. I think that is a part of the petition. Each individual has a right to petition Congress and to have his petition presented. I asked leave to present the petition, as I did, without vouching for it or even knowing what it is, or agreeing to it, but merely complying with the request to present it.

Mr. SARGENT. I have always believed very firmly in the justice of the report made by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, several years since on the duty of the Government to bear its share of the burdens of this District. I thought that the reasons given at that time by that eminent Senator were just and wise, and I am only sorry that there should apparently be a difference of opinion among the citizens of the District, some of them arraying themselves against this act of relief and justice on the part of the Government toward the District.

Mr. BECK. But the Senator must agree that it is the right of a citizen to present a petition to Congress, and that is all that has been done.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the reading of this petition is objected to on the ground that the Senator presenting it is not able to vouch for its contents. I understand that the rule of the Senate requires every Senator presenting a petition to be able to vouch for and to state its contents. Therefore, if the petition is one proper to be presented, it is proper for it to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to its being received?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of J. L. Wilson and 48 others, merchants, bankers, and business men of the city of Augusta, Georgia, praying for the repeal of the clause of the national-banking laws imposing a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating notes of State banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of R. P. Tulist and others, citizens of Wyandotte County, Kansas, praying for the repeal of the resumption act, and that there be no further contraction of the currency; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON presented two memorials signed by pilots, steamboat owners, engineers, &c., of Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of any law abolishing the local board of inspectors located at Galena, Illinois, and in favor of the removal of that board, as it exists at present, from Galena, Illinois, to Dubuque, Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the memorial of William Dean and others, trustees of the Delaware College, in favor of congressional aid for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented resolutions of Ringgold Council, No. 37, Order of United American Mechanics, of Springfield, Ohio, against any change in the present tariff duties; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of H. S. McComb and others, trustees of Delaware College, in favor of congressional aid for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHYTE presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, Maryland, in the nature of a memorial, against the transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Henry Hamilton and others, citizens and business men of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the act of January 14, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of G. J. Grammen and 16 others, citizens of Indiana, owners and officers of steam-vessels at the port of Evansville, praying the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2478) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURVEY OF CHEROKEE LANDS.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, containing a report made by men authorized by act of Congress to appraise certain lands belonging to the Cherokee Nation west of the ninety-sixth meridian. Under the act authorizing this survey the Secretary was required to report his action to Congress. I move that this report be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, together with the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1251) regulating the compensation for the transportation of mails on railroad routes, providing for the classification of mail matter, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1100) to correct an error in section 4390 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the petition of R. G. Ingersoll, and other citizens of the United States, praying for the repeal or modification of certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulating the transmission through the United States mails of certain classes of literature, pictures, &c., to ask that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the petition for the reason which I shall state. The petition asks, not for the correction of any law revised in the Revised Statutes on the ground that the revision did not conform to the original law, but the petition is for altering the law because the law is believed to be unjust. It is therefore a petition for introducing a new law and does not belong to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, so that the committee ask to be discharged and that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3119) for the relief of John I. Thomas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1065) for the relief of Toussiant Mesplie, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 964) for the relief of the owner of the bark Grape Shot, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1136) for the relief of Miguel D. Eslava, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1024) to correct the revision of the laws of the United States, to report it with a statement. This is a bill introduced by one of the Senators from New Jersey ostensibly for the purpose of correcting certain errors and supplying certain omissions in the revised and consolidated statutes, so as to make the same truly express the meaning of the laws which were in force on the 1st of December, 1873, in two particulars: first, in section 2504, Schedule M, of the tariff laws, to strike out the words "Argols, other than crude, six cents per pound;" and second, in section 2504, Schedule M, in the paragraph relating to soaps, to add the words "Castile soap, 35 per. cent. ad valorem." The effect of this bill, were it passed into a statute, would be to change the existing revenue law, although the petitioners for it may be entirely correct in their assumption that that change would amount merely to a restoration of the laws actually in force on the 1st of December, 1873. But the enactment of the Revised Statutes has wrought a change in the law in those particulars and the error which was then committed can only be corrected by a new change in the law. Inasmuch as this body has no power to originate a revenue bill, and as this is of that character, effecting a change in an existing revenue statute, I am instructed by the committee to report the bill, with the accompanying papers, back, and to move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 233) for the relief of John E. Catlett, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 29) for the relief of Robert McRae, Andrew B. James, and Emory Clapp, of New Orleans, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

MICHAEL FENTENHEIME.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 789) for the relief of Michael Fentenheime, a citizen of France, reported aversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a just appraisal to be made of the value of the property of Michael Fentenheime, at Pelican Point, Morris Island, in the State of South Carolina, when the same was taken by the United States for the purpose of a permanent fortification, and report the same, together with the facts and circumstances attending such taking, to the Senate for its information.

NARRATIVE OF POLARIS EXPEDITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1208) authorizing the publication for sale of an edition of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition, to report it back without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Public Printer to print from the stereotype plates now in his possession two hundred and fifty copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition, with such additional number as may have been subscribed and paid for when the edition shall be put to press, the whole number printed to be sold at the cost of publication, with the addition of 10 per cent., and gives authority to the Public Printer to procure the material, engravings, lithographs, &c., necessary for the publication of the work.

Section 2 appropriates $2,500 to defray the expenses of publishing such edition of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition, for sale, under the direction of the Public Printer, and it is made his duty to cover all moneys received for copies of the work into the Treasury, making a report thereof in his next annual report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EUSTIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1253) to provide for the establishment of steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1254) to provide for the expenditures of the judges of the courts of the United States while traveling in the discharge of judicial duty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1255) to amend section 2997 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK. I ask leave to introduce a bill. I desire to say that I, in common with a great many other Senators, am much annoyed by asking for the establishment of post-routes, which seems to be a matter of form. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1256) to authorize the Postmaster-General to place mail service on any public highway, river, or railroad within the United States when the public service requires it; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1257) to increase the pension of certain pensioned soldiers and sailors who have lost both their arms or both their feet or the sight of both eyes in the service of the country; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. EATON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Hubbard & Conant be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Patents.

THE HOG-CHOLERA.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed and bound in boards 20,000 copies of the message of the President communicating, in answer to a Senate resolution of February 20, 1878, information in relation to the diseases prevailing among swine and other domestic animals, with an index thereto, to be prepared by the Commissioner of Agriculture, referring to the contents of said communication under the heads of the different diseases therein treated of; of which 4,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 12,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that it go to the Agricultural Committee. That subject is now before the Committee on Agriculture, and my friend who introduced the resolution assents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution properly goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PADDOCK. We have before the Committee on Agriculture a communication in relation to this report.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am content that it shall go to the Committee on Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that resolutions to print extra copies must go to the Committee on Printing. When reported by that committee it can be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very well.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 10th instant, a copy of a report of the Director of the Mint showing the circumstances under which the receipt of deposits at the different mints for coinage into trade-dollars was suspended in October, 1877; which, on motion of Mr. SARGENT, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. BUTLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

BUILDING FOR BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1178) to provide a fire-proof building for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the mechanical branches of the Treasury and other Departments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be observed by the Senate that this bill, since the subject was originally considered and recommitted to the committee, has been very materially changed. The amount appropriated is far less and the site has been selected. I presume that every Senator will know the site at once when I mention that it is the place where are the present commissary buildings, which the War Department are about to remove. They are paying a rental on the land, and we have obtained a named price for it that I think will be very satisfactory to the Senate. It is now owned by Mr. Corcoran, and he offers the land that we want, nearly one-half of the square, for the sum named in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much is that sum?

Mr. MORRILL. It is $27,536.50. I have no doubt that the market value of the land is considerably more than this amount. It is a healthy site, and much better than would be one immediately south of the Treasury building, because it is on much higher land. The plan has been modified by leaving off the wing that was intended for a fire-proof structure to hold the documents of the Treasury. That has been omitted; and according to the present plan the building will cost but $300,000.

I will say that the bill appropriates no money but takes it out of the savings of this Printing Bureau from the appropriation made last year; and the savings will be more than they have been heretofore represented; that is to say, they will be more than $500,000. The bill proposes to take $300,000 of the appropriation made last year for the service of the bureau.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire whether the plans of this building have been made already?

Mr. MORRILL. The plan has been sketched, but it has not been drawn out in full detail. It is to be a building of one hundred and thirty feet wide by two hundred and seventy feet long, and three stories high.

Mr. COCKRELL. On what street will it front?

Mr. MORRILL. It will front on the northwest corner of the Monument Square, on Fourteenth street and South B street.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is not land belonging to the Government?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; it is land belonging to Mr. Corcoran, as I have already stated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is to be bought from him?

Mr. MORRILL. It is to be bought from him for $27,000, nearly one half of the square. It is thought extremely important that this building should be in a healthy position. Where there are to be three or four hundred persons employed all the time, it should be in a healthy position; and this place, after the most diligent search on the part of the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, has been thought to be the best that is procurable.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I notice the bill says that the land and building are to be paid for out of appropriations heretofore made to the Printing Bureau. I should like to ask the Senator what is the difference between taking the money from the appropriations heretofore made and making a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for the purpose?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The money would be covered into the Treasury at the expiration of the fiscal year if it were not reappropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not hear the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I say I notice from the reading of the bill that the cost is to be taken from an unexpended balance of money heretofore appropriated for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Now, what is the difference between taking it from that fund and making a direct appropriation for the purpose of this building? I dislike this way of going back and taking unexpended balances. I think it is a practice that ought to be done away with. There is no difference in my view, and it is much squarer and better to go directly and make the appropriation out of the Treasury instead of taking it from any unexpended balance, in any form or manner. I think the Senator from Vermont will agree with me on that.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sorry that the Senator from West Virginia makes a technical objection to this bill. It certainly redounds to the credit of the Printing Bureau that they have been economical heretofore. It shows the necessity of keeping up this branch. I trust the Senator will see no impropriety in it, and I should have supposed that he would rather have regarded that as an argument in favor of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have not made any special objection; but I believe it my duty in all cases to oppose taking money from unexpended balances. The practice is not a good one. The Senator remarks that I must give credit to the bureau for having used economy. I do; I think it is to the credit of the bureau; but it must be recollected by the Senator that the former appropriation for the Printing Bureau was very large and at that time we had fractional currency to print, which was a large portion of the amount. Having called in that currency and not reissuing it, a great difference was thereby made in the work of the Bureau; so that the saving is not all owing to economy or good management in the Printing Bureau, though a large portion of it is attributable to that, and I think it is creditable to the office. But while I make no objection to the bill on account of taking the money from unexpended balances, yet I believe as a rule it is better to make direct appropriations and let every object stand on its own footing.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia if it is not true that the particular appropriation to which reference is made was a smaller one than those that had preceded it, so that there has really been great evidence of economy in respect to the saving in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, there has been great saving and there ought to be great saving. The printing of the fractional currency was a large portion of the expenses of the bureau. At the same time I have no wish to take from that bureau any credit to which it is entitled, and I believe it is entitled to some.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am not prepared to make the statement, but my understanding is that the last appropriation to which reference has been made was very much smaller than those that had preceded it for two or three or six or eight years.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly it was, and it ought to be so, and it will be less constantly.

Mr. PADDOCK. Of course the managing officers of the bureau are just as much to be commended if out of a small appropriation they have saved money when it might have been squandered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A large amount of the saving arose out of having less work to do than formerly. The revenues of the country are not so great. The fractional currency was a large portion, perhaps more than one-half the entire work of that bureau.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is it not true that in some respects the labor has increased; that they are doing some kinds of work that had been done before by the bank-note companies?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The reissuing of bonds, the changing the bonds, has probably added work to a limited extent.

Mr. PADDOCK. My understanding is that considerable added labor has been taken on by the bureau during the past year in the respects that I have named.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I take no interest, for one, in the question started by the Senator from West Virginia. He objects to this money being taken from an unexpended balance. It is a mere matter of book-keeping; it is a mere question of form.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is all, and I so stated.

Mr. CONKLING. I knew the Senator would agree with me in that. The question is whether so much money is to be devoted to a particular use; and whether it is to be charged to one fund or charged to some other fund is mere mint and cumin; it does not vary at all the truth that the proposal is to devote so much money of the United States, whether it is taken from one till or charged to one account or another.

Mr. President, when this bill first came forward I objected with some hesitation, but I find now that I am glad I did, for the honorable Senator having it in charge has changed one or two things in the bill which I think vindicate the objection that was made. It is pretty clear now that the vacant space between the Treasury Department and the river is not to be encumbered, and as I think defiled, by putting such a building upon it. The proposal has now come to be to go off on the hill on Fourteenth street.

Mr. MORRILL. And I will say to the Senator that it is to remove all those workshops and shanties that are now on the grounds in front of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is certainly an increased advantage, because I think we ought not unnecessarily to disfigure one of the most agreeable parts of the open space in this large reservation.

But, Mr. President, I am not ready yet to vote for this bill, much as I confide in the judgment of the Senator who intimates that we should vote for it; and I turn, as one reason for my unreadiness, to the top of page 2, where I read that the building is to be of brick, to be built by contract, and "upon plans to be obtained and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury." Passing this bill and making it a law does not facilitate obtaining plans any more than passing it the other day would have facilitated the selection of a site. We have seen meanwhile how easy it is to go and select a site without having an act of Congress behind you. It shows that a man can pick out a position for a building without doing it by act of Congress. I have no doubt an architect can draw a plan without feeling that he stands on an act of Congress when he does it. I would like to see the plan either through my own eyes or through the eyes of the Senator from Vermont which are so much better. I heard him say that there was a sketch, a suggestion of a plan. If that is the plan, say so in the bill, "according to the plan submitted or presented." We have said that before; say so now. If the language here employed is to be adopted, there is no plan. There is no possible restriction to the unbridled option of the Secretary of the Treasury to build any sort of building upon any plan provided the building and the site together do not exceed in cost $327,500.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. As he has devoted some attention to this, and I never saw the bill until this moment, I ask him has he any idea that a building in which the work now done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is to be done can be built fire-proof for any such sum as $300,000?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir, I have not.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the first question. Then another question while I am up, as my friend has devoted some attention to this matter: does he see any absolute necessity for this Bureau of Engraving and Printing at all?

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, that is a question which I should not want to answer yes or no; but I will indicate, as far as I can, my idea about that in one moment.

First the Senator asks me if I suppose this building can be made, as is here contemplated, fire-proof and adequate to the manifold purposes suggested in the debate and in the bill together, for $300,000. I do not suppose any such thing; and therefore it is that I feel inclined to insist upon having a plan, not a sketch, not a suggestion, not a vague bird's-eye view of what sort of a building might be made, but a plan, not only an elevation, but a working plan that the committee or somebody else will tell us they have looked at, and which demonstrates, as far as by a plan it is demonstrable, that $300,000 taken from this unexpended balance is enough to accomplish this feat of a fire-proof building of such dimensions and such variation of use as has been suggested heretofore.

I do not mean by this to impute anything possibly to anybody who has this matter in charge. Here is the Supervising Architect of the Treasury who has in charge scores of buildings over the country and has had heretofore. How invariably it turns out that the cost of the building exceeds the original intention, and that where we have put in the act that it should not exceed a certain limit and that no money beyond that should be expended, the price has frequently turned out to be double. And so in answer to the question of the honorable Senator from Ohio I say again let us have a plan, let us have an estimate, let us have a working plan which shows, approximately at least, how much money the building is to cost and approximately what it is to be after it is finished.

Further the Senator from Ohio asks me a question which I have thought of a good many times, for a good many years, and which has been put to those much better informed on the subject than I am. It is whether we are likely to save money as a venture by undertaking to do, the Government for itself, the kind of work contemplated in this bureau. Well, Mr. President, I have heard it affirmed by every astute man that even the postal service of the country, as vast and varied as that is, could be done by contract by private persons, if it were admissible to let it to contractors, express companies or otherwise, for very much less than it costs and very much more efficiently. That is putting a very large illustration; perhaps it is a hazardous assertion. I do believe, however, that when you come to limited and definite business, as for example printing and engraving, if you resorted to private enterprise, with competition brought to bear, men skilled in that as a specialty bidding against each other, with the rivalry of emulation and of contest in trade, the probability is it could be done cheaper by individuals than it is likely to be done by that general kind of agency and instrumentality which appears for the Government. Therefore I do not believe, after hearing of the saving which has been made in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, that it is a measure of economy to expand and amplify and permanently provide for that sort of business being done by the Government directly rather than being done for those engaged in it, equipped and prepared for it, who, bidding against each other, propose the lowest terms upon which anybody who is responsible will undertake to execute the work. So, without venturing to give any more nearly than that an answer to the Senator from Ohio, I feel at least the doubts which seem to lie behind the question he put, in regard to this whole business.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the Senator concludes his answer, I should like to ask him another question. I have not had time to look at the statutes; but when was this Bureau of Engraving and Printing created and how was the work done for the Government from the foundation of the Government up to that time? The Government issued a great many bonds, a great many Treasury notes, a great many stamps of various kinds before this Bureau of Engraving and Printing was created. How was that done? Was it done under contract, or how?

Mr. CONKLING. It was done by bank-note companies for long years. When the war came on and when it was necessary, as was supposed by one school of financiers, for the Government to start a paper-mill, a paper-mill was started in the Treasury Department, and legal-tender notes, greenbacks, bonds, seven-thirties, and all sorts of things which made up the manifold descriptions of currency and representatives of indebtedness, were more or less printed in this bureau, at the same time two bank-note companies being allowed to do a part of it, and as "tall oaks from little acorns grow," this bureau, from the supposed necessity of the times, has strengthened itself and enlarged until it has come now to be petrified as a part of the permanent establishment and equipment of the Government. That is as I understand it; and more definite as to dates I cannot be.

But, Mr. President, the chief point which I wanted to present to the Senator from Vermont is that it would seem to me to continue what has been done since this bill was previously objected to, by having the plans now, since the site has been selected, perfected and determined, and let the bill be based upon those plans and definite estimate of cost.

Mr. MORRILL. I hardly suppose, Mr. President, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, certainly not myself, could perfect this bill so that it would not be open to the criticism of the Senator from New York. It was expected that I should be able to bring this bill before the Senate immediately after the action of the Senate upon it some weeks ago; and we asked the Treasury Department to give us a plan. They gave us this plan, but I have been unable heretofore to find any morning when I could bring the matter to the attention of the Senate.

Now let me say that we have a sketch of the plan, and we also have a sketch of the amount of each item that it will cost to build this fire-proof building, of which the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York seem to express some doubt as to its possibility. I have here a statement from the supervising architect of the amount it will cost for excavating, the amount of brick, stone, iron, carpenter's, joiner's, and plasterer's work, the cost of marble, plumbing, vault, elevator, and contingencies. The building is to be constructed by contract, and of course must come within the amount that is prescribed in the bill.

There is no sort of doubt that the Department makes a saving in doing this work itself of some 25 or 33½ per cent.; and it is the opposition of those who desire to do this work instead of having it done in the Treasury Department that has obstructed action hitherto in relation to it. This bureau does the ordinary printing for a large part of the Government. It does also the repairing of machinery in other Departments, and the saving that is made by this is very large. It is not expected to exalt and expand this bureau to any extent at all; it is merely to enable it to execute its present duties with proper economy, and with greater facility, and without any detriment to the present large existing Treasury Department building. There is no question that it is a damage to the present building to have this work conducted in it. If we make this appropriation it is expected that this building will be completed during the recess, before the next meeting of Congress. It is to be a plain, substantial building for the present work, and nothing more, of the Treasury Department. It will enable the Department to obtain a considerable number of rooms that are now used for this business. This will give room in it to bureaus that are now outside of the Treasury building proper.

I am sure that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have given this subject all the attention that was possible and I hope the bill will meet the approval of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I was struck by a question of the honorable Senator from Ohio as to the previous demands of the Government for the engraving of stamps and bonds and Treasury notes. I should like to ask that honorable Senator when it ever amounted prior to the war to anything that would even employ one small bank-note company?

Mr. THURMAN. It did employ more than one at times; at least more than one had contracts at times. But I do not think it needs any particular inquiry to inform the Senator from Maine that if this work were done by contract there would be plenty of companies to do it.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but the Senator intimated that there had been some great change from the former policy. The truth is, whether it is our misfortune or not, there never was any necessity for this bureau before the war, because the amount of public bonds that the Government of the United States ever issued before the war was very small; the debt never amounted to $100,000,000; and the amount of Treasury notes was very small and the issues were many years apart. We never even began to issue postage-stamps until 1850, and I do not know that the postage-stamps are engraved now in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; I doubt whether they are. I am told they are not.

But this is worth observing, that there is no great monetary institution in the world—and the Government of the United States has become a great paper-money concern—that has ever been willing to trust its engraving outside of its own control. The Senator from Ohio doubtless knows that the Bank of England, probably the largest financial institution in the world, manufactures its own paper, does its own engraving; and the Bank of France does the same. All the large institutions do that. I should like that honorable Senator to say before the Senate whether he would think it wise to intrust all the plates of all the bonds and of all the notes and of all the currency of the United States outside of Government control altogether. What sort of security have you got if you ask banking companies here or there to engrave to the amount of hundreds of millions per annum? You are leaving the ability to counterfeit, and not merely to counterfeit, but to issue your own notes with the slightest possible change of numbers and letters, you are incurring a hazard which might bankrupt the United States almost and destroy the reliability of its currency. Now the precaution has been taken, I believe, to have one side of the notes printed outside. We do not even trust the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but we have one side of the notes done by a company outside, and then have the stamping and the lettering and the numbering always done in the Treasury. I should think it to be a most extraordinary experiment, with the large amount of paper securities in various forms that the United States has now, to intrust itself or to permit that to be done by a company, however responsible they might be in their relations to the public.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I favored the reporting of this bill to the Senate. I do not know anything about the propriety of the Government's continuing to carry on this bureau. I have no criticism to make in reference to the policy which seems to have led to the necessity of the creation of the bureau; nor have I anything to say now as to whether the bureau shall be continued. But the fact is we have a bureau for engraving and printing, and it is located in the Treasury building, occupying valuable space in that Department building, and from its very nature endangering the building and the property of the Government of the United States therein. The question presented to the committee was, shall this committee now propose to remedy what seems to be a great wrong; shall they propose a building especially designed for this work? Upon consultation with the chief of the bureau they have agreed that for the sum named in this bill a building can be constructed fire-proof that will answer all the purposes of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and they have sought to obtain the cheapest site they could obtain for that building, and one, I believe, that is satisfactory to every Department of the Government.

But it is said there is no plan and the objection is urged that because there is no plan the bill ought not to pass. This committee has no money at its disposal for the purpose of procuring plans of public buildings, and that has not been the practice which has been pursued by the Senate with reference to the public buildings of the country. The practice has been to get an appropriation and out of that appropriation plans have been agreed upon by those in charge of the particular work. It is so in regard to all the public buildings in the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope we shall be allowed to finish the bill. I move to postpone all other orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is the bill for the repeal of the resumption act, which is before the Senate. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone it and all other orders for the purpose of further considering the bill which has been under discussion during the morning hour? Is there objection?

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to give notice that at three o'clock or earlier, if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] shall have finished his remarks, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Of course, I cannot give my reasons now; but I trust the Senate will go into executive session at an early hour to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning after the morning business I shall ask the Senate to finish the bill under consideration the last two mornings, being the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon." The matter has been discussed at some length for several mornings. I gave way this morning for the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Vermont. I desire to complete it to-morrow morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that by general arrangement yesterday and also by general consent which prevails at all times in the Senate the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was allowed to have the floor at one o'clock to-day. In courtesy to him I call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that I have seen the Senator from Alabama and I have said to him that if this bill should take up much time I should not insist on its consideration. I merely ask for a few minutes. I do not think there is any disposition to debate it at any length; and if it can be disposed of I shall be very glad to have it done this morning.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very firmly convinced, I must say to my friend from Vermont, that this bill cannot pass in twenty minutes. There are several Senators who wish to speak upon it. I am not very ambitious to speak this morning, but whenever this bill is pressed to a vote I want to give reasons why I shall vote against it. I will say while I am up that the question which moves me is this: if we are to continue this business of engraving and printing then I agree that a building should be erected for it to get the thing out of the Treasury Department; but the question with me is whether we ought to continue it.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I will say that, as soon as the Senator from Alabama gets through with his speech, I shall ask the Senate to continue the discussion of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I have already given notice that I shall move then to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I give notice that I shall insist on the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; we will try the question.

INTERCOURSE WITH MEXICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By prior arrangement the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor on the resolution which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 8th instant:

Whereas the people of Mexico, animated with the love of free government which distinguishes the people of the United States of America, have long adhered to a republican form of government as that which is best suited to preserve their liberties, and have maintained their free republican institutions, under the embarrassment of the most adverse circumstances, with an honorable devotion to their principles, which merits the sympathy and regard of the American people; and

Whereas the most essential interests connected with the welfare and prosperity of the people of both governments, in their various relations, require that permanent peace should be maintained between them, and that confidence, good will, free intercourse, and liberal reciprocal advantages of trade and commerce should be established:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) 1. That in defining and settling by treaty the relations of the United States of America with the republic of Mexico it is just and expedient, and in accordance with the interest which the people of the United States have in the maintenance of the right of self-government on this continent, that the present boundaries between Mexico and the United States shall be guaranteed as permanent and inviolable.

2. That it is proper that both governments shall engage that the territory of each shall be protected against conquest by any power residing beyond the seas.

3. That it is expedient that liberal provisions shall be made by treaty to secure to the people of both countries the equal and reciprocal advantages of intercourse, trade, and commerce with each other, and that, to increase the advantages of such intercourse and to place upon a stable footing the peace and friendship of the two republics, it is expedient that such mutual agreements shall be entered into as will protect the borders of both countries from the predatory raids of bands of outlaws; and that persons who are citizens of either country residing in the other shall enjoy the rights of hospitality secured to the citizens of the most favored countries, and shall be free from all unlawful interferences with or arbitrary exactions and assessments upon their persons or property.

4. And it is also expedient to provide by treaty for the protection and encouragement of such citizens of either country as shall, with the consent of the Government of Mexico, build and equip a line of railroad from the City of Mexico to the Rio Grande, in the direction of San Antonio, in Texas, or to any point on the borders of the United States, to connect with a line or lines of railroad at the boundary between the United States and Mexico, and to secure the safe transit of the citizens of each republic and their property over such line or lines of railroad within the territory of each country, subject to such commercial regulations as shall from time to time be agreed upon by the respective governments.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I highly appreciate the indulgence of the Senate in giving me an opportunity to discuss a subject that is not yet fully before it for consideration. I would not have ventured so far to tax the courtesy of the Senate if I did not feel that the subject I have brought to its attention is of sufficient immediate interest and importance to justify me in making some explanation of the facts on which the resolution is based.

The attention of the people in every quarter of the country seems to be drawn with unusual interest to our relations with Mexico. We are finding it extremely burdensome to maintain a heavy border-guard on their frontier, and very painful to listen to the appeals of our people for protection, which even a strong Army is not sufficient to give them. With fire and sword our southwestern border is vexed, our people are murdered, and their homes are pillaged and then destroyed. A more efficient remedy for this intolerable state of affairs must speedily be found, at whatever cost to us or to Mexico. Whether or not the remedy I have the honor to suggest will prove to be sufficient, it seems to me that our first and unavoidable duty requires us to offer something like it to Mexico for its acceptance. We are too powerful as a nation and our ability to conduct great military movements is too well established to permit us to engage in war with a nation less powerful, (and that nation a republic,) which is our immediate neighbor, until we have made every reasonable effort to provide by some means a remedy for our grievances less cruel and destructive than war.

It better comports with our honor as a people that we shall again resort to diplomacy, and that we should begin by endeavoring to remove from the minds of the people of Mexico every suspicion they may have of our honorable intentions.

There is nothing that is new either in the statement of facts recited in the preamble or in the principles or policy indicated in the body of the resolution just read.

A recurrence to our diplomatic correspondence and to our treaties with Mexico since she became an independent power will show that in every essential particular we have urged upon that government every proposition contained in the resolution, except the joint agreement to give protection to the territory of each government against conquest by powers residing beyond the seas.

Until the treaty of Gaudaloupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty we had not come under any distinct agreement with reference to the future extension of our borders upon Mexican territory; and while in those treaties this agreement is not expressed in terms, I think the just construction of them is that they pledge us to a policy that would protect rather than threaten the intregrity of Mexican territory along our borders. Under ordinary circumstances it would not be entirely consistent with our dignity that we should enter into pledges in advance of negotiations which would render them directly relevant that we will not make aggressions upon the territory of a neighboring country. And when that nation is a republic, our foster sister, whose institutions are modeled after our peculiar constitutional system, such voluntary overtures would place us in an attitude still more unsatisfactory in the absence of some strong, justifying causes to support it.

But circumstances exist that seem clearly to require it of us as a duty, that the United States, speaking through the resolutions of Congress, as well as through our diplomatic representatives, should make a firm and open declaration on this subject. The necessity for such a declaration has not been created so much by the fault of either government as by the misfortune of each that their people are imbued with the suspicion that the real policy of the United States toward Mexico includes the ultimate absorption of its entire territory within our boundaries. Our country has had a very rapid expansion of its limits in the direction of Mexico and Alaska, and has been restrained only by a courageous statesmanship from including Santo Domingo, Cuba, and the Hawaiian Islands.

In the presence of such facts, even our own people are putting to themselves the question how far we are committed to such ambitious designs, and whether we are not repeating the history of Rome with reference to a provincial system on this hemisphere. We must not chide Mexico for a want of faith in the disinterestedness of our intentions until we have at least met the force of a strong array of facts by some declarations that will prescribe definite bounds to our future enterprises which relate to their welfare.

The Gadsden treaty, which was signed on the 30th of December, 1853, is the latest agreement with Mexico on the subject of the boundary. The first article of that treaty contains the following language:

> The dividing line thus established shall, in all time, be faithfully respected by the two Governments, without any variation therein, unless of the express and free consent of the two, given in conformity to the principles of the law of nations, and in accordance with the constitution of each country, respectively.

The express and free consent of the two governments may be obtained in many ways to the further dismemberment of Mexico. It could not be obtained for our dismemberment. The question for us to settle for ourselves, and with reference to our interests, and as a principle or policy of government to be determined in our own counsels is, shall we further attempt to gain the express and free consent of Mexico to our further encroachment on her present domain or shall we put a curb upon our ambition for territorial aggrandizement as a matter of duty and of wise policy? If we adopt, as I hope we shall, the course last mentioned, it will be an act worthy of a great and honorable people that we should make the solemn declaration and then proceed to treat with Mexico upon that basis.

If we shall preface our next attempt at negotiation with Mexico with a solemn declaration that the present boundaries between Mexico and the United States shall be guaranteed as permanent and inviolable, we will have removed every pretext for a reserved policy on the part of Mexico, and will bring our relations to a speedy if not a satisfactory settlement.

The inviolability of the boundaries of Mexico includes the duty on our part to respect the sanctity of her borders as we require her to respect ours. We should deal with Mexico on this subject as we would deal with Canada under like circumstances.

It is a principle of public law that we are not at liberty to disregard, that when we enter into treaty relations with a power it is the honor of our Government, and not the weakness of the power we are dealing with, that restrains us from disregarding our engagement. If Mexico disregards her duty toward us so as to require us to act in disregard of treaty obligations, we should first abrogate the treaty and then take measures for redress. I refer to this in connection with the complaints of Mexico, or rather of Mexicans, that we enter their territory to enforce our laws against the marauders who habitually visit our country for most unjustifiable purposes. This system cannot be peacefully maintained. It will keep up a virulent excitement on both borders, and will eventuate in open warfare. It is scarcely less now. This is the first vital point of controversy that needs to be arranged, and I do not believe that we can long defer its final settlement.

The doubts which cloud the minds of so many people on this subject are employed by the alert and daring pronunciadores in Mexico who unite politics and warfare into a profession, as romantic in its exciting incidents as the knight-errantry of the Middle Ages, to keep the people aroused with constant alarm and hot with angry resentments. It is easy for these chevaliers to persuade their dependents and retainers that our imputed Anglo-Saxon greed for land is constantly exciting in us an unholy lust for their beautiful country.

A party also exists in Mexico composed of men who have long despaired of the republic and have turned their thoughts anxiously to the United States as a refuge from revolution and a government under which they hope at last to realize their aspirations for the substantial blessings of constitutional liberty. The flitting scepter of power which has shifted through the hands of more than fifty rulers within as many years has left many an aching heart among the leading men in Mexico, some of whom in their desperation would welcome our republican flag as the emblem of constitutional liberty and the destroyer of the hopes of their successful rivals.

The existence of these conditions of public and private sentiment in Mexico, far more than the want of sincerity and good faith in the observance of treaty obligations on the part of its government, gives rise to a further necessity for some authentic declaration of the will of the people of the United States in reference to the matter supposed to be left open in the Gadsden treaty, to which I have already referred.

Since 1853 our own Government has encountered great perils and has undergone great constitutional changes. New men are in authority everywhere, who are of necessity modifying their opinions on all questions that concern the country to meet the very novel and difficult problems that arise on every hand. What may be the opinions of these new rulers and representatives cannot be clearly known or confidently asserted until by discussion and voting they have been freely expressed.

It is believed and asserted by some of our leading statesmen that many of the people of the United States, and especially those of the Southwestern States, are maturing plans to acquire five or six of the northern states of Mexico, seeking thereby to increase their political power in the Union and to enrich their people with the spoliation of Mexico.

It is conjectured also by some that we of the South and Southwest are looking to Northern Mexico as a point of concentration of our negro population, so that they may be formed into States under the exclusive control of the negroes and incorporated into the American Union as natural allies of the Southern States.

Others still are charged with the purpose of invading Mexico, in combination with dissatisfied people in that country, to conduct filibustering expeditions against the border Mexican states.

When within our own powerful and progressive country such statements are freely and openly made and discussed, it cannot be unbecoming or gratuitous that Congress should solemnly declare a policy in reference to the inviolable integrity of Mexican soil, which will command the confidence of that people and give them that feeling of security and that repose which are so essential to a proper consideration of their highest interests and wisest policy with reference to us.

I will take this opportunity to say for myself and for the people of Alabama, what I am sure is the feeling of the entire South, that we desire nothing in reference to the people of Mexico except that they should be independent, self-governing, happy, and prosperous and on terms of the most friendly and intimate commercial intercourse with our people; and we believe that the first and most essential predicate of these results is that we should agree that the territorial integrity of Mexico should be maintained inviolate on its borders adjacent to the United States.

War, of course, annuls all treaty engagements between nations except those relating to a state of war, and are consequently reserved in case of hostilities; but, war or no war, we should declare our policy on this subject as well with reference to our own interests and duty as with reference to our future relations with Mexico. Without attempting to argue the matter fully at this time I will assert my confidence in the wisdom of the proposition that it is better for our country, better for Mexico, better for the cause of free republican government throughout the world, and a better expression of our faith in constitutional liberty, that we should uphold Mexico as an independent constitutional republic, even if we should be forced at any time into a war with her, than that we should either absorb her territory within our boundaries or witness her lapse into monarchical government.

We who appreciate the necessity of individual character in the constituency of a free republican government understand the value of the effort to bring the Mexican people up to a higher standard. They need to be educated in the personal rights and duties of the individual citizen. Mexico needs a great body of citizenship, who, understanding the value of their personal rights and liberties, will be able to control the adventurers that keep them in the constant throes of revolution.

Mexico is not without cause for jealous sensibilities toward the people of the United States, while we have the highest reasons to deal with her in a spirit of generous magnanimity.

In September, 1813, while the United States was engaged in a war with Great Britain, which has been justly called the second war of independence, the people of Mexico, animated with a love of liberty and independence and inspired by our example, declared their independence of Spain. Our achievements had not then proven to them that the final success of our republican experiment was certain. They only had our example, from which they gathered the conviction that the cause they loved deserved the greatest sacrifices, and that such sacrifices merited success. They struggled against the great Spanish monarchy and with great and powerful Spaniards in Mexico for ten years, and won their independence but not their coveted liberties. Iturbide supplanted the Spanish monarchy with the empire of Mexico. This was not republican liberty. Mexicans demanded the essential fruits of their victorious struggle, and on the 2d December, 1822, Santa Anna proclaimed the republic at Vera Cruz, on the spot where Cortez had landed and planted the standard of Spain and the cross just three centuries before. During all that long period Mexico had been a viceroyal state of the Spanish monarchy and had been ruled by sixty-four viceroys, not one of whom was born or reared on her soil.

The Mexican war of independence and her proud success suffer nothing by comparison with our great Revolution. The people of Mexico ordained a liberal and wise constitution, formed upon the model of our own, and united in one free government nineteen states and five territories; one of the territories being Texas, which afterward became a state of Mexico, as the twin sister of Coahuila. Many of those are now living who welcomed Mexico as an independent republic into the family of nations and into the American sisterhood of States with rapturous delight. Their children should not easily forget the proud emotions of joy and triumph with which those sister-republics first grasped the hand of friendship and plighted to each other the faith and vow of mutual support and protection. Our first treaty with Mexico was a treaty of limits. We first fixed the boundaries, and then afterward we treated of amity and commerce in the most liberal and fraternal spirit. Those were proud days for Mexico, and we shared her pride and rejoiced in her prosperity.

Our limits then were the Sabine River to thirty-second parallel of latitude, thence north to Red River, thence west with that river to longitude 100° west from London, thence north to Arkansas River, thence along that river to latitude 42° and by that parallel to the South Sea.

Colonists from the United States were invited to Texas by Mexico. They assembled in numbers and when a revolution in Mexico in 1835 abrogated the constitution of 1824 and converted the confederation of States into a consolidated republic Texas alone of all the States refused to submit, and Santa Anna levied war against her and invaded the State. He remained there a prisoner of war, and Texas gained her independence while fighting within the Union for her rights under the Mexican constitution. Her independence was only declared within a month before the battle of San Jacinto.

Texas did not resort to the overt measure of secession; she adhered to the union until the federal government drove her out and then she became independent. These facts are worthy of attention as showing how very similar were the issues upon which Mexico was dismembered, and from which the United States escaped dismemberment not without great difficulty and terrible losses. In Texas alone Mexico lost 274,856 square miles of her territory. Within a single decade the United States acquired more than one million square miles of Mexican territory, leaving her only 761,640 square miles. It has turned out that the portion of Mexico that has fallen to us is the richest part of her domain in agricultural productions and probably in mineral wealth. For all this vast and incomparable territory she has received less than half the sum we are likely to bestow as a bounty on a single railroad to traverse a part of the ceded territory.

No just estimate of a proud-spirited people could lead us to expect that they would not have apprehension that our purposes toward them were not free from all color of selfish aggrandizement. In dealing with them we should try to understand them and appreciate their views with reference to ourselves in a spirit of candor, and we should attempt to remove all unjust suspicion of our motives by open, frank, and plain declarations of our policy and of the principles of our action toward them. They should be made to feel that the present generation of men, after having so recently escaped the anarchy that has so often distracted their republic, in restoring our country to constitutional rule, would be glad to strike hands with them again as our fathers did in 1824; that our new covenants should extend beyond the mere guarantees of independence from foreign domination and should include the restoration of peace, order, law, and liberty under constitutional protection to those people.

The rudiments of constitutional liberty were not taught to Mexico under the Spanish monarchy as they were taught to us under British rule in Magna Charta, in the petition of right, the bill of rights, and the act of settlement. They copied from us what we had inherited from the wisdom and experience of many generations, each improving on the work of their ancestors. If, when they met with troubles that it seemed impossible to survive, they lost their way for a time and anarchy reigned in the midst of tumult, darkness, and violence, we should remember, in forming our opinions of their capacity for free self-government, that without the steady light of the experience of centuries to guide us we would have fallen as they have often done. We have had our troubles, from which the counsels of our fathers delivered us. Our people have not yet been restored to equanimity and repose with reference to a disputed presidential succession which occurred eighteen months ago.

In that dangerous agitation our safety was due to the conservatism in which the great body of our people have been bred, rather than trained, causing them to esteem the great essential elements and principles of liberty secured by constitutional guarantees, as above the value of everything else connected with government—the advantages of power, the emoluments of office, and the glory of success. They felt that one presidential succession secured by the intervention of military power, or by an armed mob, would not only make other such successions possible, but would make any succession impossible that was not enforced at the point of the sword.

The troubles of Mexico began with an event like this, and the people permitted a resort to arms for its settlement. It will be their most difficult task to retrace their steps and to regain that high ground of regard and veneration for constitutional authority which is the only safety of a constitutional republic and which would have saved them from many a bloody revolution. Viewing the dangers we have so narrowly escaped, my sympathies for the Mexican people are deeply excited; and when we see them, after every new struggle and after misfortunes so great and so often repeated, always returning to their first love—a constitutional republic—we must heartily acknowledge that they merit our respect and confidence.

Ten millions of people thus wedded to liberty and devoted to the right of self-government are the worthy friends of this great republic. Led by a native Indian chief, they fairly beat the united power of the French and Austrian empires and wrested from the hands of a wise and able monarch the scepter with which he had supplanted their sovereignty. In everything but the internal administration they are a united and powerful people. Whatever may be the opinions of foreign nations as to the Mexican people or their government, they are entitled to our respect and sympathy, and we should enter into any proper alliance with them as equals. They should be invited to unite with us in the reannunciation of the Monroe doctrine, if it is still a doctrine of our national policy. If it is not, it should be renounced. But it is the doctrine of our people, and they will witness its abandonment only with indignant shame. Within six months after the close of our civil war the Government could have united the Federal and confederate armies into one common host of volunteer soldiery to have expelled Maximilian from Mexico.

What I have said as to the respect and sympathy due from the people of the United States to the people of Mexico has been said in full view of the border outrages from which our people have suffered and yet suffer so severely. I do not fail to appreciate that evil, nor do I underestimate its magnitude. The able and exhaustive report of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented by its chairman, Hon. Mr. SCHLEICHER, of Texas, brings to the attention of the country a state of affairs in that quarter that cannot be tolerated, and confronts us with the duty of its prompt consideration. The selection of the proper remedy is a matter of grave difficulty. We can, in some sort, suppress these raids by maintaining a heavy military force on the borders at an annual expense of six to eight millions of dollars, but it is our duty not to submit to this necessity.

This is a tax that the country should not be compelled to bear, and that the people will not willingly vote. Besides this there are but two alternatives open to us; first, the conquest of Mexico and its absorption into the American Union, or the establishment over it, as a province, of a military government; second, the concentration of the influence and power of the entire people of Mexico, through treaty agreements, upon this subject in such a manner and with such decisive effect that they will be able to put an end to these troubles.

I do not understand that any federal government in Mexico has aided or encouraged the marauders on the Rio Grande. On the contrary, those in authority have made efforts, more or less vigorous, but none effectual, to repress them. It is those who seek to gain power, the pronunciadores, who are alert at all times to excite the people to insurrection, that are promoting these raids. They appeal to a traditional jealousy and hatred of the Government of the United States to invite these people to commit theft and murder, and justify the crimes by reference to their former causes of resentment. With the leaders these movements are mainly designed for political effect. With their followers the hope of plunder and booty is sufficient incentive to the most cruel outrages. I have failed to discover that the people of Mexico who live away from the borders give any support or countenance to these robbers. In Central Mexico, and especially in the cities and larger towns, the citizens of the United States are treated with hospitality and consideration.

I feel quite strong in the conviction that, if the people of Mexico could be brought to the consideration of this subject with reference to its importance to their own welfare, they would compel any and every government to which they may be subjected to use all the force necessary to give perfect security to the borders. I am satisfied that the chief difficulty at the bottom of this matter is in the fact that the people of Mexico are not convinced that it is our purpose to deal with them in a just and generous spirit.

This jealousy of the people of the United States displays itself in almost every public act that relates to us. In the granting of concessions to railroad companies which have been projected toward our borders, conditions are always imposed which are designed or expressly stated to have the effect of excluding the people of the United States from ownership or control over the roads. They expressly stipulate that the companies shall receive no aid from the United States Government. They seem to be apprehensive that whatever we do with reference to them or propose to do in concert with them is designed as the initial act of a project of aggression.

This disposition is plainly exhibited in the extensive diplomatic correspondence of our Government with that of Mexico in reference to the Garay and Sloo contracts and the Gadsden treaty. This is the root of the trouble; and until we remove it we are in danger of being forced to extremities with the people of Mexico, which would be deplorable in every sense. We must convince them, and that at an early period, that we do not intend to extend our Government over any more of their territory, and thus secure their confidence and arouse them to provide for the peace and security of our people on the borders. Or, failing in this, we must give them to understand that, if we should be compelled to move our lines further out as a means of security to our people, we will establish our border lines on the southern boundary of Campeachy, Chiapas, and Yucatan, and thence along the coast to our present boundary.

In this connection, for the purpose of showing what the real spirit of Mexico is in reference to us, I will call the attention of the Senate to some brief extracts from articles which appeared in the leading journals of Mexico about the time orders were given by this Government to General Ord to cross the Rio Grande with his troops and make arrests of marauders who might escape to that side of the river. The first is from the Monitor Republicano, an independent opposition paper:

THE AMERICAN INVASION.

Public attention has been very much excited by the news of the projected American invasion brought by the last packets.

After our civil wars, after our social decay, after all our political misfortunes, we have before us, we have over our heads, the formidable threat of a nation that not without reason has been called the American colossus.

The press of the United States is at this moment discussing the propriety or impropriety of the policy President Hayes is pursuing with respect to a country weak, but jealous of its independence. The Mexican press will unanimously repel the unjust aggression which with a political view is falling over our country.

Every evil, every misfortune appears to have been let loose against us; this is the moment to resort to that holy passion called patriotism, to avoid the catastrophe. Poor Mexico! It was not sufficient for you to see your fields laid waste and your sons decimated by civil strife; it was necessary that a nation that called itself a friend should select the most painful crisis in order to discharge on you the weight of its strength.

We are very fearful that the negotiations that are to be commenced with the American generals and the government of that country will not have a happy result. It is the general opinion that President Hayes needs to withdraw the public attention from the irregularities of his election, and to provoke a war that will permit him to maintain an army sufficiently respectable to meet every emergency.

The newspapers that support our cause inform us that even the superstition of the people has been worked on by making them believe that a locust having its wings in the form of a "w" proclaims or foretells war. The giant has, then, allowed the idea to flit across his brain of annihilating us under his powerful hand; and if he has not already done it, it perhaps is because the nineteenth century is destroying the doctrines of the right of conquest and because they who attempt to destroy the nationality of a people are condemned at the bar of civilization.

We have wasted our political and social vitality; we have been destroying and annihilating ourselves, while our powerful neighbor has gone on prospering under the development of its just and liberal institutions, and the hour of peril has come, finding us more than ever exhausted of blood, and with only the vigor inspired in every Mexican by the love of his country, his nationality.

This is not the time for rancor and political odium; we should rally under our flag and give each other a brotherly embrace. General Diaz has already answered the first menace of the neighboring nation, and in truth the note of our minister of war is dignified, energetic, and forms a strong contrast with the order in which General McCrary orders the invasion of our territory if circumstances make it necessary. "You will repel force by force in case the invasion takes place," is the order given to General Treviño, as it is, indeed, the duty of the Mexicans; in complying with it it may be that they will not be triumphant, but they will have the satisfaction of sustaining the dignity of the country.

I will read a brief extract from another paper which is also styled independent, the Siglo. These papers are considered of sufficient importance for our minister to Mexico, Mr. Foster, to draw the attention of this Government to them. This paper says:

DUTIES TO THE COUNTRY.

If the orders given to General Ord by the Government at Washington with respect to Mexico are highly serious, they have at least served to demonstrate that the sacred fire of patriotism remains intact in the valiant hearts of the sons of the country.

It is not an immediate war that threatens us. We have not yet entered the period of a real conflict. It is not right for us to cast off the hope that the difficulties that have arisen between the two republics may reach a peaceable, proper, and even cordial solution. The way of pacific and dignified negotiations is still open, and nevertheless manifestations in favor of our nationality and our independence are reproduced on all sides and reveal noble and loyal sentiments.

Civil war has consumed us; society is continually in a bad condition; we live in constant revolution; brother has forgotten brother; friend has forgotten friend; the father the son; the son the father; the family is divided; the law is shipwrecked; justice hides her face. But in the midst of this painful confusion a voice is heard that says, "The country is in danger," and immediately is perceived a general movement that seeks one common center of salvation, and that marks the line toward which all lines are uniformed.

These expressions, Mr. President, it is evident upon their face, are not merely the heated declamation of partisanship in the midst of political controversy. Within the city of Mexico and amidst revolutions which have been continually moving about that city, men would not have this liberty and freedom of speech, and they would not speak in these impassioned terms in reference to their country, unless they really felt the force of what they said.

I refer to this as the state of public opinion in Mexico, not one that I by any means concede is justified by our conduct toward Mexico but as indicating that for which we must provide remedies in our relations hereafter to be established or better regulated between this Government and that. I have no fault to find with the diplomatic officers of the United States Government in their dealings with Mexico. It is a difficult, dangerous, and tender subject, and I have cause to believe that our diplomatic relations with Mexico have been guided by wisdom and great prudence, and that all that can be accomplished there will be accomplished if the people of the United States will give assistance to our diplomatic agents through resolutions to be adopted solemnly by both Houses of Congress to the effect that those relations when established by diplomacy are not false expressions of the views of American citizens, but that they do speak the honest, heartfelt sentiments of our people, and that we at last have got our own consent to put a curb on our ambition and stop our march on the Rio Grande.

It is to my apprehension the most alarming danger of the future that the sturdy growth and rapid movement of our people in every field of enterprise, which are the indicia of a spirit that will not brook control, may compel us to vote armies to ambitious leaders for the conquest of this continent and its adjacent isles, and then of this hemisphere. Great possibilities suggest themselves readily to a people who have so quickly accomplished the virtual mastery of this continent, and have so well secured and so greatly improved all that has been gained. I dread this abrogation of the lines of neighboring States and this process of absorption of their people, which some seem to gloat upon as the final proof of our greatness. It is better that the lines should stand and that our people should enter them as citizens, taking with them their arts and sciences, invigorating them with their enterprise, and teaching them the excellence of our institutions.

But if we shall ever be compelled further to seek "security for the future and indemnity for the past" in Mexico, it is an idle dream that we shall be able to accomplish it by taking five or six of its northern States. The states of Coahuila, Chihuahua, Nuevo-Leon, Sonora, Lower California, and Durango have 363,506 square miles and 765,478 of population, about two persons to the square mile. With such an addition to the savage population we are now compelled to watch over and provide for, scattered over such a wide range of rugged country, and the ceasless strife on our new borders with the embittered Mexican people, we should find it necessary to increase the Army to at least double its present strength, adding $20,000,000 annually to our expenditures and very little to our resources.

If we are forced to make war or to accept war with Mexico as the means of securing peace upon our borders, I am unable to conjecture how we can ever safely terminate the struggle until we have extended our Government over its entire territory. No event could be more painful than this to one who is the honest friend of free constitutional self-government.

If the people of Mexico and our people were brought together in the free association which trade and commerce make necessary, we would very soon overcome every difficulty that we now find so much in the way of a good understanding between us. I believe that no other agency or instrumentality will ever be found so effectual in this matter as the bringing together of our people and the Mexican people in honorable business and social intercourse. I need not discuss a proposition that is so palpably true and that has proven itself with such happy success in removing the estrangement of our own people after a long and bitter war, in which almost every family in the entire country was involved.

In the treaties we have made with Mexico the points of the third and fourth resolutions have been affirmed in principle. This is notably the case in the Gadsden treaty, which I will refer to. In the eighth article of that treaty General Gadsden arrived at an agreement with the government of Mexico on the very subject that is involved in the third and fourth clauses of the resolution I present, after long and earnest diplomatic interconrse between the two governments, conducted with great vigor and great energy on our part. The eighth article is as follows:

The Mexican government having on the 5th of February, 1853, authorized the early construction of a plank and railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec and to secure the stable benefits of said transit way to the persons and merchandise of the citizens of Mexico and the United States, it is stipulated that neither government will interpose any obstacle to the transit of persons and merchandise of both nations; and at no time shall higher charges be made on the transit of persons and property of citizens of the United States than may be made on the persons and property of other foreign nations, nor shall any interest in said transit way, nor in the proceeds thereof, be transferred to any foreign government.

The United States, by its agents, shall have the right to transport across the isthmus, in closed bags, the mails of the United States not intended for distribution along the line of communication; also the effects of the United States Government and its citizens, which may be intended for transit, and not for distribution on the isthmus, free of custom-house and other charges by the Mexican government. Neither passports nor letters of security will be required of persons crossing the isthmus and not remaining in the country.

When the construction of the railroad shall be completed, the Mexican government agrees to open a port of entry in addition to the port of Vera Cruz at or near the terminus of said road on the Gulf of Mexico.

The two governments will enter into arrangements for the prompt transit of troops and munitions of the United States, which that Government may have occasion to send from one part of its territory to another, lying on opposite sides of the continent.

The Mexican Government having agreed to protect with its whole power the prosecution, preservation, and security of the work, the United States may extend its protection as it shall judge wise to it when it may feel sanctioned and warranted by the public or international law.

It will be observed that this treaty, with most assiduous care, provides for the transit of mails in closed bags across the isthmus, and for the transit of troops and munitions of the United States, and that passengers may pass without passports or letters of security.

These important advantages yet remain to us over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Our Government has not and will not willingly yield them. When Mr. Trist was negotiating the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo he was instructed by our Government to offer a large sum to Mexico for this privilege. I believe it was $15,000,000; as much as we gave for the million square miles of territory we then acquired. No project was ever more warmly espoused by our Government than this railroad across Mexico to connect the two seas. A short extract from the letter of Mr. Fillmore to General Arista will sufficiently show his earnest advocacy of this enterprise.

I will read some extracts from the letters of Mr. Webster and President Fillmore at the time the negotiations were progressing in reference to this Tehuantepec route. Mr. Webster, in a letter to Mr. La Vega, on the 15th of March, 1852, says:

The Government of the United States can in no event be expected to abandon those rights, and ardently hopes that the Mexican government will do justice to them in season. This hope is strengthened by the fact that the Tehuantepec Company have addressed a memorial to this Department, setting forth the grievances which they have sustained from that government, and refuting in a manner which cannot fail to be satisfactory to the people of the United States the reasons alleged by Mexico for inflicting those grievances.

Mr. Fillmore, in a letter to President Arista, who was then President of Mexico, found it necessary to step forward and take this subject of diplomacy into his own executive hands, not because he was not supported by the very ablest men in the United States, but because it became necessary in his opinion to impress upon the Mexican government and the Mexican people the fact that the whole people of the United States had concentrated their desires and fixed their purposes in absolute determination that this right which had been guaranteed, not to us but to one of our citizens, by the transfer or assignment of a contract, should be carried into effect and should be protected by treaty. Said Mr. Fillmore:

The deep interest which I feel for the prosperity of both the American and Mexican republics, and especially for the preservation of harmony between them, induces me to waive the ceremony of diplomatic intercourse and address Your Excellency unofficially upon the subjects of difference between our respective countries. I cannot doubt, from what I have heard from Your Excellency's character, that you sympathize with me fully in my desire to maintain the most harmonious relations with your government, and that your enlarged and enlightened views must enable you fully to appreciate the importance of opening an interoceanic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Though this enterprise may not be indispensable to the commerce of the United States, yet I shall not attempt to disguise the fact that it is one of great importance, and in which the people of this country feel a deep interest. It must be apparent to Your Excellency that in all probability more than one such communication will be opened. Measures are now in progress for opening one through the State of Nicaragua and another through the Isthmus of Panama; and the question therefore presents itself whether it is wise or politic for Mexico to refuse her consent to authorize another route through her territory.

A mere glance at the map must satisfy you that the travel and commerce between the eastern and western shores of North America will naturally take the most northern route between the two oceans; and the same must be true in reference to Europe, and especially Great Britain, in her intercourse with the western coast of America. The commerce of the Atlantic States of North America with the western coast of South America may pass through the Nicaragua or Panama route with as much facility or even more than through the Tehuantepec. Independently of the right which some of our citizens claim under the Garay grant to open this communication, it would be a matter of great indifference to the citizens of this republic whether such communication were constructed by the subjects of Great Britain, the citizens of Mexico, or those of any other country. All that we ask is that the best and safest mode of intercommunication shall be established of which the nature of the country will admit, and that it will be open and free to the commerce of the whole world without any exclusive right in any nation, and under the sole jurisdiction of Mexico herself.

The command of such a commerce must be a mine of wealth to Mexico, and I should feel it was a waste of time to urge upon Your Excellency the importance of securing it to her before it seeks and finally becomes fixed in other channels. I can well understand the prejudices that pervade some of your people against the United States, growing out of recent events, the recollection of which I sincerely wish might be buried in oblivion. I can also understand how these prejudices may affect the representatives of those people in congress, whose assent is necessary to the ratification of the treaty that shall secure these blessings to Mexico and the commercial world. But I am sure Your Excellency will rise above all such local and popular prejudices and view this question as one of great importance to Mexico and of scarcely less importance to the world.

Now, sir, there was the difficulty. General Arista, at the head of that republic, was regarded by all Mexicans not merely as a true and honest patriot but as a man of greatness, liberality, and intelligence; and the President of the United States, in addressing to him a personal communication, to which he replied in a spirit that is almost filled with anguish as to his want of power to control Mexican sentiment, addresses himself to the very point which is to-day the point of most imminent necessity for consideration; that is, that the people of Mexico are jealous of us and will not support their men in authority in having those negotiations with us which are so absolutely essential to the proper establishment of good relations between the two countries.

From the time that General Arista wrote his reply to Mr. Fillmore down to this time, that jealousy has not only existed, it has not even been modified; I may say, to the contrary, it has been aggravated; not by our fault, not by our misconduct, but, as I said in the opening of my remarks, by the misfortunes attending the efforts of both countries, that the people on both sides of this line are imbued with a suspicion. Whatever we may say in our diplomatic treaties with Mexico, there is still an underlying belief on the part of that people that it is the policy and the destiny of the American Republic to absorb their empire. That is the view I desire to submit; that is the first foundation-stone that must be laid for permanent peace between Mexico and the United States.

A railroad from the Rio Grande to the City of Mexico, connecting with the Texas lines, would be of far greater value to the United States now and hereafter than the Tehuantepec line could ever have been.

Along the Mexican coasts on both sides there is a coast range of mountains a short distance back from the seas that rise to a great height, and are so abrupt and declivitous as almost to defy the skill of the engineers to build railroads across them. The road from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico is an average grade of one hundred and thirty-three and one-half feet to the mile, and cost about $27,000 to the mile, its length being two hundred and sixty-three and one-half miles. In places it cost over $150,000 to the mile. Yet this is one of the most eligible passes from the coast to any part of the great interior plateaus.

This subject is so ably treated by Mr. de Vietelli in the American Encyclopedia that I cannot forbear to read an extract from his article. Speaking of Mexico, he says:

The face of the country is extremely diversified. The littoral regions are in general low and sandy, especially on the Atlantic side, where they were probably submerged at no remote period as far as the foot of the mountains. In no part of the republic within thirty miles of the sea does the land rise higher than one thousand feet, except perhaps in Chiapas, where the chain of the Mexican Andes presents a mural barrier facing the ocean, toward which the descent is exceedingly rapid. But the traveler, journeying inland from either side north of the Tehuantepec Isthmus, climbs by a succession of gigantic terraced mountains to a table-land with a mean elevation of eight thousand feet, extending far beyond the northern limits of the republic.

That is a very important matter, that eight thousand feet rise at the City of Mexico, extending far beyond the northern region of the republic.

On the railway from Vera Cruz to the capital, every variety of climate is experienced within the space of a few hours, and the natural productions peculiar to each are successively passed in review, from the sugar-cane, indigo plant, and plantain of the tropics to the pines, firs, and licheus of the north. The cordillera of the Andes enters the Mexican territory from Guatemala, and to about latitude 17° 30′ extends almost midway between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; from that point it curves nearly due north to latitute 21° 15′ and approaches the east coast, attaining its maximum elevation somewhat south of the parallel of Mexico City, between Toluca on one side and Jalapa and Cordova on the other, where several peaks rise to fifteen thousand and seventeen thousand feet above the sea. Still farther north the Sierra Madre runs north by west toward Guanajuato, near which city it widens considerably and separates into three distinct branches, the most easterly of which trends in a generally northern direction through Nuevo-Leon to latitude 24° 30′, then bends northwest, and, traversing Coahuila, gradually declines in elevation as it approaches the Rio Grande. The central branch, or Cordillera de Anáhuac, the highest of the three, runs northwest through Zacatecas, Durango, and Chihuahua, taking successively the names of Sierra de Acha, Sierra de los Mimbres, Sierra Verde, and Sierra de los Grullas; about latitude 30° it is united by a system of spurs with two lateral chains, that of Texas to the east and that of Sonora to the west.

A most remarkable geographical configuration which attracted the attention of Humboldt in his earlier travels through this continent.

The western chain, or cordillera proper, runs nearly parallel to the last through Michoacan, Jalisco, Zacatecas, Sinaloa, and Sonora, and is linked by spurs advancing westward to the maritime Alps of California. That portion of the Mexican Andes richest in silver is comprised between latitude 16° and 20°, while the alluvial auriferous soil continues a few degrees farther northward. A striking similarity between the general structure of the Mexican and that of the South American Andes is observable in the barrancas or vast fissures frequently intersecting the cordilleras. The backs of the mountains form very elevated plateaus or basins sufficiently uniform in height to be regarded as one of continuous table-land. The valley of Mexico is an elliptical plain with an area of about nine hundred and forty square miles, fringed on the east, south, and west by lofty peaks, some of which are active volcanoes. Indeed, the plain may be regarded as one vast volcanic hearth, roughened at intervals by isolated hills rising abruptly from the surrounding level.

The most elevated summits are at the southeast, where Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl tower majestically over all the rest. So regular is the great plateau (formed exclusively by the broad, undulating, flattened crest of the Mexican Andes, and not the swelling of a valley between two mountain ridges, such as the Alpine valley of Bolivia or that of Thibet) and so gentle are the slopes where depressions occur that the journey from Mexico to Santa Fé, New Mexico, (about twelve hundred miles,) might be performed in a four-wheeled vehicle. From Mexico south to Oajaca, in the center of the plain of that name, with an elevation varying from three thousand to six thousand feet, the route is almost as level as from the capital northward.

The silver-bearing and gold-bearing portion of Mexico in actual value is far below its agricultural worth. I will add to this a short extract from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, to which I have just referred, which embodies some additional statistics and facts in regard to this subject. The report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, heretofore alluded to, after an explanation that the United States should liberally subsidize a line of steamships from some American port to Vera Cruz, says:

Of far more importance and promise to our commercial intercourse, but requiring more time for its practical application, would be the extension of one or more of our lines of railroad into Mexico.

In support of this recommendation the report states further:

That there are no serious physical difficulties in the way of such extension has been well known since the time of Humboldt's visit to Mexico, at the beginning of this century. In his Political Essay on New Spain that eminent observer, who paid particular attention to the topography of the country with reference to its facilities for commerce, gives an accurate and most interesting geographical description of that portion of Mexico that would be so traversed.

The following statement, in its principal features, is taken mainly from his observations:

The eastern coast of Mexico has, properly speaking, no port, for Vera Cruz is merely a bad anchorage between the shallows of La Coleta, La Gallega, and La Lavandera. From this port, such as it is, a narrow belt of low lands extends to the mountains, and then there is an ascent, which is almost impracticable for a railway, to the principal, most desirable, and most populous part of Mexico, the high table-land on which the City of Mexico, as well as all the most important cities are situated. There is not in the whole country, after leaving the Gulf coast, a single navigable river.

From the City of Mexico the high table-lands extend with a gradual descent toward the north of Texas, and as far as New Mexico. Humboldt expressly calls attention to this admirable topography for a wagon-road, and points out how, from the line of Louisiana, an almost uninterrupted plain leads with a gradual ascent to the plateau upon which the City of Mexico is situated.

South of the Rio Grande there is not a noticeable river to be crossed.

The distinguished geographer speaks of wagon-roads simply because railroads were not then known. But from his remarks, confirmed as they have been by all subsequent observers, the conclusion is irresistible that if any country is both destined to be developed by railroads and dependent on railroads for its development, it is the high table-land region of Mexico from the City of Mexico to the Rio Grande, and that nature itself indicates the line for such railroads. One or more railroads extending from Texas into Mexico on this natural route would connect the important cities of Monterey, San Luis Potosi, Durango, Zacatecas, Aguas Calientes, Guadalajara, Leon, Guanajuato, Queretaro, the City of Mexico, and many others, with our country.

Lines of railroad on the table-land would be able to give very cheap freights, and would offer a direct and far more feasible connection with our own seats of commerce than that by way of the dangerous and sickly harbors of the Gulf coast.

* * * * * * *

It is quite obvious that the development of our commerce would be very much more promoted by direct communication with the interior of Mexico than by the most successful competition we can otherwise look for.

The city of Mexico is indeed "a city set on a hill, which cannot be hid" from discerning eyes. At an elevation of eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, it is ready to pour the rich productions of the great plateaus of the interior into the lap of the Mississippi Valley lying at the foot of this long and gentle incline, of which the Mississippi River is the eastern border and the Gila and Colorado Rivers are its northwestern borders. Between these great centers of commerce there is no barrier of natural obstruction. It is a smooth and open way, with easier gradients than any line of equal length across this continent. This has been the highway of nations for many centuries, the great military road of Mexico leading to the Saline and to El Paso del Norte. Neither Mexico nor the United States will have done their plainest duty until they have placed upon it a line of railway to bind these countries together with the real and enduring bonds of peace and unity.

In this enterprise rests in a large degree the peaceful and honorable solution of all our troubles; the healing of all our bitter animosities; the cordial friendship of our people; their united effort in maintaining and disseminating the principles of republican government, and with them civilization, knowledge, and the moral elevation of the people who now waste in darkness. The two great republics, thus honorably engaged in a work so full of the fruits of peace and righteousness, would again recall the attention of mankind to the contrast of our free institutions as compared with the baneful principles of monarchical power, which having covered Bulgaria and Roumania and Armenia with the corpses of soldiers and of women and children left rotting in the open air to gratify an insane love of power, now alarms every household in Europe and Asia with apprehensions of universal war. I desired to open to the Senate this door of inquiry into this great subject, and not to direct their inquiries to every important feature that it so readily suggests. I hope the subject may receive that enlightened consideration which the Committee on Foreign Relations are so well able to bestow upon it, and that they may feel, as I do, that there is an imminent necessity for their early action.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

During the executive session the injunction of secrecy was removed from an affidavit of Alexander Warner, in relation to the nomination of George F. Cutter, which was read in executive session, and from the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the said nomination; whereupon,

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the affidavit of Alexander Warner be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to inquire into all the circumstances connected with his dismissal from the public service at the navy-yard at Brooklyn; and that in their investigation the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That the committee be authorized to appoint a subcommittee to proceed to New York to take testimony, with power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths to witnesses.

After one hour and thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 15, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to make a correction of the Journal. I am reported as not voting yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to adjourn. I voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

The Journal as corrected was then approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, Mr. DURHAM, Mr. BRIDGES, and others addressed the Chair.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. BRIDGES. I desire to ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to require the Secretary of State to furnish information to Congress in reference to the claim of Carlos Butterfield against the government of Denmark.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to rise to a privileged question.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask whether a question of privilege arising upon a proposition for final adjournment is of higher character than the question of privilege already before the House.

Mr. HALE. Is not that a question for the House to settle?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes inquiry of the Chair whether the Senate concurrent resolution providing for the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on the 10th of June next is or is not a question which can be considered during the pendency of the question of privilege now before the House as unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the Chair this inquiry: whether, as both the question under consideration and that referred to by the gentleman from New York are questions of privilege, it is not for the House now to settle which one it shall first consider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the resolution for final adjournment is a question of privilege between the two Houses; that it is analogous to a conference report, which is held to be in order even against a motion to adjourn as it runs to the settlement of differences of action between the two Houses; and therefore, in reply to the gentleman from New York, the Chair would hold the resolution for final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress is a question of privilege between the two Houses.

Mr. WOOD. And therefore takes precedence and is first to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Senate concurrent resolution fixing the final adjournment for the 10th of June next, having been postponed until this day after the reading of the Journal, comes up first to be disposed of.

Mr. HALE. As a question of the highest privilege?

The SPEAKER. As a question of higher privilege between these two questions.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD. I call up, then, Mr. Speaker, the Senate concurrent resolution fixing the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress of the present session on the 10th of June next, which was postponed to this day, and move its further postponement until the 29th instant, and on that question I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEIL. I hope the House will not further postpone its consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will give the House the reasons why he moves the postponement.

The SPEAKER. Inquiry should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did address the Chair. I said, "I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will state his reasons for asking the postponement."

The SPEAKER. The reason why the Chair has called attention to the rule is because the other day there was a controversy about a motion——

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Ohio appeals to me to know why I move the postponement of the further consideration of this resolu tion. If the House desires me to state the reason why, I will briefly do so. Of course it requires unanimous consent, as the previous question is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSE and Mr. CHALMERS demanded the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has the right to do this in his own time.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has demanded the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to further postpone the consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution for the final adjournment of the two Houses on the 10th of June next until the 29th of May, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HALE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 106, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—130.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. My colleague, Mr. STEPHENS, is paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. STEPHENS is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were present, he would vote in the negative and I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with Mr. POWERS, of Maine.

Mr. MARTIN. I am paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey, who, I believe, will be back to-day.

Mr. BEEBE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BUNDY.

Mr. TURNEY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WHITE. If he were here, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am paired with Mr. BISBEE. I would vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] If he were present, he would vote in the negative and I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am paired with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania. If he were present, I would vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. HENRY. My colleague, Mr. ROBERTS, is in the city but is detained at his room by illness.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. ERRETT, is paired with Mr. THROCKMORTON. If present, Mr. ERRETT would vote in the negative. Mr. KILLINGER is paired with Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Mr. KILLINGER, if present, would vote in the negative.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. On the question of fixing the time for the final adjournment, I am paired with Mr. KILLINGER, of Pennsylvania. If he were present, I would vote "ay" on the pending proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. OVERTON, is absent by leave of the House. He supposed he was paired, but the return of the gentleman with whom he was paired releases the pair.

Mr. McCOOK. My understanding yesterday with my colleague from New York [Mr. WILLIS] was that I was paired with him for that day only; but lest there should be any possible misunderstanding I do not vote. If Mr. WILLIS had been present, I would have voted "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 20) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories, to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 3824) to authorize the survey of the Cattaraugus Indian reservation in the State of New York; and

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the society of the Sons of St. George, established at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,440.25 in gold, being the amount paid by said society upon a colossal statue of St. George and the Dragon.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs for present consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) requiring the Secretary of State to furnish information to Congress in reference to the claim of Carlos Butterfield against the government of Denmark.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the regular order.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the pending question is upon seconding the previous question upon the preamble and resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] on Monday.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 118, noes 0.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine having made the point that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers. The Chair appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 122, no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 95, noes 30.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and also called the list of absentees; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Bisbee,	Killinger,	Quinn,	Townsend, M. I.
Bundy,	Landers,	Rice, Americus V.	Walker,
Carlisle,	Loring,	Roberts,	Walsh,
Clarke of Kentucky,	Money,	Robinson, M. S.	White, Harry
Ellsworth,	Morse,	Stephens,	Willis, Benj. A.
Errett,	Overton,	Stewart,	Willits,
Frye,	Powers,	Strait,	Wright.
Harris, B. W.	Pugh,	Thornburgh,

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SOUTHARD in the chair.) The roll-call is now complete, and it appears that two hundred and sixty members have answered to their names, which is a quorum.

Mr. POTTER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the previous question upon the resolution offered by Mr. POTTER on Monday last.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from New York listen to me for a moment?

Mr. KENNA. I demand the regular order.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 127, noes 0.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 120, no 1.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, said: I rise to a question of order. The rules of the House require that every member upon the floor shall vote unless he has been excused by the House.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing, and the Chair will hear the point of order hereafter.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I ask for a decision on the point of order now, and for the enforcement of Rule 31.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order now that no quorum has voted in order to save it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes cognizance of the point of order of the gentlemen from Maine. The rule referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House divides or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without debate.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Rule 2 makes it the duty of the Speaker of this House to preserve order and decorum, and Rule 31 makes it the duty of every member upon this floor to vote unless he has been excused by the House. The language of the rule is imperative, that he shall vote unless he has been excused by the House. Now I call attention to the fact and I will name a member, that the Speaker may know to whom I allude. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has failed to vote, and he has not been excused by the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am present.

Mr. BANKS. There is no question before the House. This is not a debatable question; it relates to the order of business.

Mr. FORT. I submit that we are all paired upon this side.

The SPEAKER. This is not a new question, or a new difficulty rather. The Chair has caused the rule to be read, which is the extent, he thinks, of his power in this connection; in other words, he knows of no way, no physical power that can be exercised even by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and no persuasive power of the Chair, even if he possessed it, to compel gentlemen to vote; but if the gentleman from Tennessee indicates a way the Chair will follow it.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I suggest that the Chair can order the Sergeant-at-Arms to carry the members who stand in flagrant and contumacious disregard of the rules and orders of the House between the tellers. [Laughter.]

Mr. BREWER. Let him try it.

Mr. CAMP. How would the Sergeant-at-Arms know which way a man wanted to vote?

Mr. MILLS. This question was raised by the republicans against non-voting democrats on the civil-rights bill, and I wish to remind the House that the decision made by Mr. Speaker BLAINE, when the point was made by some of the republicans that the democratic members did not vote, was that you could lead a horse to water, but you could not compel him to drink. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. No quorum being present on the vote by tellers, nothing is in order except a motion for a call of the House or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to know why my colleague [Mr. POTTER] does not proceed to the enforcement of the attendance of members under the call, and why he moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. FORT. That is a very pertinent inquiry.

Mr. FINLEY. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. POTTER. I will make answer to my colleague from New York, [Mr. BEEBE,] and also to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.] We have not got and we cannot bring a quorum here to-day, I mean of our side of the House, and we passed on yesterday a concurrent resolution of the two Houses providing that the two Houses shall adjourn to-morrow at four o'clock, and by virtue of that adjournment any proceeding to bring any members now outstanding would fall. Therefore it is thought expedient to defer until after that hour the motion which my colleague suggested.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BEEBE. I hope, then, that after the adjournment to-morrow, when we shall meet again, an order will be issued to bring in every member on both sides of the House, [cries of "Regular order!"] so that all pairs may be declared off.

Mr. POTTER. One word about a point of order, if I may be allowed to state it.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that the House take a recess for ten minutes in order that the Speaker's suggestion of using his "persuasive powers" may be carried out. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be too great a task.

Mr. HALE. The time is not long enough.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we cannot hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and gentlemen are requested to resume their seats.

Mr. POTTER. I will again move that there be a call of the House. In doing so I wish to say that I am perfectly aware——[Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"]

Mr. HALE. I do not think anybody on this side will object to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] making an explanation, if I can follow with a proposition.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to say, if I may be allowed to do so——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement.

The motion of Mr. POTTER, that there be a call of the House, was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll and also the list of absentees; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Baker, William H.	Killinger,	Rice, Americus V.	Townsend, Martin I.
Bisbee,	Landers,	Roberts,	Walker,
Bundy,	Loring,	Robinson, M. S.	White, Harry,
Carlisle,	Money,	Springer,	Willis, Benj. A.
Clarke, John B.	Overton,	Stephens,	Willits.
Errett,	Powers,	Stone, Joseph C.
Frye,	Pugh,	Strait,
Harris Benj. W.	Quinn,	Thornburgh,

The SPEAKER. On the call of the roll 263 members have answered to their names—more than a quorum.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House now adjourn, so as to give our republican friends a chance to get back to their seats.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred a joint resolution in relation to the soldiers' reunion——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. POTTER. I hope my colleague [Mr. COX] will withdraw the motion to adjourn, and let us take one more vote, so as to give our absentees a further chance to get here.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not see any use in trying longer to-day to get a quorum of our friends here.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the preamble and resolution submitted on Monday last by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

The question was taken, and upon a division there were—ayes 103, noes 0.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 105, no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from New York——[Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FRANKLIN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 170, not voting 42; as follows:

THURSDAY, May 16, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of Centennial Council, No. 7, of the Sovereigns of Industry, of the District of Columbia, representing one hundred and thirty-six families, in favor of the enactment of such a law by Congress as will insure full weight to purchasers of coal and compel coal-dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EATON. I present the petition of H. E. Woodhouse, whose places of business are in New York and Brownsville, Texas. He represents that he has a claim against the Republic of Mexico; that his claim was duly submitted to the United States and Mexican claims commission, created and organized under and by virtue of the convention of the 4th of July, 1868, between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and that there was an adverse decision unjustly rendered by that commission. He therefore prays for a rehearing of his case. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented the memorial of James Conner's Sons and others, of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any bill to refund to Miller & Richards a fine imposed upon them for undervaluing goods passed through the custom-house at San Francisco, California; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, Missouri, in relation to the pro rata matter between the Union Pacific and the Kansas Pacific Railroads, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolutions, if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Are they resolutions of the Legislature of a State?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of the city of Saint Louis.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not like to object to the reading, but it seems useless to cumber up the RECORD with memorials and petitions and resolutions which are sent to us by bodies other than the Legislatures of the States, and if the Senator is not particularly anxious to have the resolutions read I hope he will not insist upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know that it is very essential. They are simply resolutions expressing the great desire of the citizens and merchants and business men of Saint Louis to have the question of prorating fixed and established by law so that there will be no unjust discriminations against the Kansas Pacific Railway. I ask that the resolutions be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am not so particular about having them read. As there is a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which that matter has been referred, I trust the resolutions will go to that subcommittee.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not understand whether the Senator still insists on having the resolutions read or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He does not.

Mr. PADDOCK. If he does, I hope the order may not be made, because I wish at the same time those resolutions are read to have read also a decision of the United States circuit court just rendered at Omaha on this very question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri does not ask that the resolutions be read. They will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of Juliet Leep, widow of Henry Leep, deceased, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle her claim against the Government for loss and damages sustained by the seizure and detention of the vessel Mary Teresa at the port of Bahia by order of the United States consul at that port on the 20th of January, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS AND COLONIAL CHARTERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing, to print additional copies of the Agricultural Report and Colonial Charters. If it is taken up I shall give way to further morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate by common consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now yield to morning business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are now in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of War communicating copies of the annual reports of the generals commanding the Departments of the Columbia and of Dakota, and recommending that they be printed as a part of his annual report for 1877, to report the same back and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. The committee do not hesitate to advise the Public Printer to include it in the printed report, as reports are frequently sent piecemeal.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1253) to provide for the establishment of steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil, to report it without amendment and ask that it be placed on the Calendar. Accompanying the bill is a report which I ask may be printed. I give notice now that at the earliest opportunity consistent with the business of the Senate I shall call this bill up and ask to have it put upon its passage.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1081) for the relief of David G. Potts, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1258) for the relief of Nimrod D. Keneaster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1259) to amend chapter 15 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1260) for the relief of John W. Chickering; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have been requested to introduce a bill for the relief of certain employés of the United States Government in the District of Columbia. I have no knowledge of the subject, but I introduce the bill at the request of persons interested.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1261) for the relief of certain employés of the United States Government in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1262) to amend an "Act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1263) to provide for the adjustment and settlement of certain internal-revenue taxes erroneously assessed and collected from the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1264) for the relief of the legal representatives and sureties of Cyrus K. Osgood, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREERY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1265) to incorporate the Army and Navy Life Insurance Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ARMY REFORM AND REORGANIZATION.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg leave to introduce a joint resolution which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) to create a commission to consider the subject of Army reform and reorganization; which was read the first time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That two members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, to be designated by the President of the Senate, three members of the House Committee on Military Affairs, to be designated by the Speaker of the House, and three officers of the regular Army, who have served not less than ten years, to be designated by the President of the United States, be, and they are hereby, constituted a commission to whom the whole subject-matter of reform and reorganization of the Army of the United States, be, and is hereby, referred.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall carefully and thoroughly examine into the matter with reference to the demands of the public service, as to the number and pay of men and officers and the proportion of the several arms; and also as to the rank, pay, and duties of the several staff corps, and whether any and what reductions can be made either in the line, field, or staff, in numbers or in pay, by consolidation or otherwise, consistently with the public service, having in view a just and reasonable economy in the expenditure of public money, the actual necessities of the military service, and in the capacity for rapid and effective increase in time of war.

SEC. 3. That said commission shall assemble as soon as practicable and proceed to the consideration of the matters with which they are charged, and make report to Congress by the first day of the next session, through the President of the United States, with all the evidence of record, or otherwise, which they shall have received and considered. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of said commission, to be expended under the direction of the president of said commission.

The joint resolution was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIM OF T. WORTHINGTON.

Mr. THURMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate as to what discrepancies, if any, exist to the prejudice of T. Worthington's claim, between the Third Auditor's reports of March 20, 1876, and March 20, 1877, and his statement of February 21, 1876, including the Third Auditor's reports on the claim of March 9, 1867, January 31 and March 25, 1870, with indorsements on the same and with the reasons for said discrepancies, if any such exist.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, to accompany the bill (S. No. 1124) for the relief of the Winnebago Indians in Wisconsin, and to aid them to obtain subsistence by agricultural pursuits, and to promote their civilization. I introduced this bill some time ago, and at my request it was laid upon the table until the receipt of this information from the Secretary of the Interior. I now move that the bill, together with this communication, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN THORNS.

Mr. BECK. I desire the consent of the Senate to have the vote reconsidered by which the bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of John Thorns, of Fayette County, Kentucky, was indefinitely postponed, so that the bill may be placed on the Calendar. There is some new evidence in the case. I make that motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be placed on the Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further business of the morning hour the resolution moved by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is before the Senate and will be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to give notice that so soon as the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia. It is very important to the parties in interest that the bill should be decided one way or the other at once. I shall therefore ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill so soon as the matter is disposed of called up by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3570, for the relief of a blind soldier.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution pending now, moved by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I shall ask to have it taken up after that is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has just given notice that he will succeed the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have given notice for the last three or four days that after the morning business I should call up my bill which has been pending. I gave special notice yesterday to that effect. The bill has been up and considered several mornings. I hope the Senate will not lose sight of my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island in regard to printing the Agricultural Reports is before the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I feel constrained to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing to defer the consideration of the resolution temporarily until the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] comes in, who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and who has some figures in connection with this subject of the printing of the Agricultural Reports, of which I am not myself possessed at this moment, and which I should be glad to have submitted to the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to accommodate my friend from Nebraska and my friend from West Virginia; but it is desirable that this question should be disposed of. I am constantly importuned by members of the House that we should have these documents printed in order that they may distribute them before the session closes. I will, however, consent that the resolution be laid aside temporarily until the Senator from West Virginia comes in, subject to be called up then.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is the extent of my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid aside informally.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 532.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will give way to me this morning.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Tennessee has consented to give way to me to pass a bill to increase the pension of a blind soldier.

Mr. HARRIS. I did consent to yield to the Senator from New York, but I have the floor. I should like exceedingly to oblige my friend from Oregon, but I must insist, if the Senate will allow me to say so, upon the consideration of the bill I have referred to, which has been hanging here a long time. It is very important that the bill should be acted upon at once, if at all.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Tennessee, however, yields to me to call up House bill No. 3570.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if his bill relates to a road in the city of Washington?

Mr. HARRIS. It proposes to incorporate a city railroad company.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is some necessity for speedy action?

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the District of Columbia thought so, and they reported the bill more than a month ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give way. I suppose I shall have to give way, so far as that is concerned, as my friend has the floor; but I appeal to the Senate, inasmuch as I have given notice now four or five mornings, that after this bill is considered the Senate will proceed with and finish my little bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I will agree to that, and simply ask the Senate to consider the little bill to which I referred at this time.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York for that purpose.

JOHN MURPHY.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3570) granting an increase of pension to John Murphy, late private Company F, United States Infantry.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay to John Murphy, late private Company F, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the $24 per month which he has been receiving, it appearing that he is totally blind and needs the constant attendance of another person.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions what is the rate of pension to a soldier disabled as this person is, under existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. There is a specific rate of pension allowed for total disability requiring the personal care and attendance of another person, which the law fixes at the rate of $50 per month, by an act of Congress passed for that purpose.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] reported this bill. I asked him about it and am satisfied it is right.

Mr. INGALLS. The report is in writing.

Mr. KERNAN. I am sure if the Senator from Delaware had seen the man as he came to me, he would not doubt the justice of this measure.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The report was made by myself. It is a House bill. The man was brought before the committee and examined in the presence of the committee, and the committee had no doubt, as I have no doubt, that the case comes strictly within the terms of the law giving the sum of $50 a month to a person totally blind, who requires the care of another person.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the general law?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is the general law. The bill gives him the rate fixed by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why does not the Commissioner of Pensions give it to him?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He was examined some time ago, and the surgeon thought that he could distinguish between night and day, and for that reason thought he was not entitled to extra pension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then this act is necessary to give him his rights?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is necessary to give him his rights.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Enough said.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He ought to have this relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT AND COLONIAL CHARTERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is now in his seat, and I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was laid aside until the Senator from West Virginia appeared. The Senator is now in his seat, and the Secretary will report the resolution.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution of the House of Representatives is in the following words:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877; 224,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 56,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed five hundred.

The Committee on Printing propose to amend the resolution, so that, if amended, it will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 200,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877; 150,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 30,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed six hundred; and

Be it further resolved, That there be printed and bound in leather 4,555 copies of the Colonial Charters and Constitutions of the United States, compiled under the direction of the Senate, of which 900 copies shall be for the use of Senators and the Vice-President, and 2,500 copies shall be for the use of Representatives and Delegates; and the remaining 1,155 copies shall be distributed by the Public Printer, as follows: To the President of the United States, 2 copies; to the Department of State, 50 copies for transmission to the United States legations and consulates general abroad; to the War Department, 1 copy, for the Military Academy at West Point; to the Navy Department, 1 copy, for the Naval Academy at Annapolis; to the Department of Justice, 100 copies, for the use of that Department, the Chief-Justice and Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Assistant Attorney-General, and the Solicitor-General; and to the Smithsonian Institution 1 copy; and 1,000 copies for sale by the Public Printer at the cost of printing and binding, under such regulations as he may prescribe, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, as the resolution provides for the printing of one thousand copies of the Colonial Records for sale, if there is any demand for the document to justify its being printed for sale by the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is. One bookseller in this city has ordered one hundred copies.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I doubt very much the propriety of the Government going into the publication of books for sale at any rate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out after the word "bound" the words "in leather;" so as to read: "that there be printed and bound 4,555 copies."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the amendment of the committee reducing the number of copies of the Agricultural Report provided for by the House resolution will not be adopted. The number of copies of the report provided for by the House resolution corresponds almost exactly with the number printed last year, and the number is small enough. In all decency and propriety the number ought to be much larger than that provided for by the House resolution. The amendment of the committee in regard to increasing the number of pages so as to embrace the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture without any elimination is a very proper and a very wise one; but the printing of the whole number of pages as reported by the committee and the printing of the whole number of volumes as provided for in the original resolution would not very materially increase the expense over the sum that would be necessary under the resolution as reported from the Committee on Printing. All the extra expense there is for the additional number is the press-work and paper, and it is very small economy to try to save a few hundred dollars in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Move an amendment to the amendment by changing the number back again.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will move, therefore, to amend the amendment of the committee by changing the number of the copies of the Agricultural Report back to 300,000. That accords with the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment, proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask before that amendment is reported that we take the vote on the first amendment proposed by the committee, and if we disagree to that then the resolution will stand just as it was when it came from the House. The first amendment proposed by the committee refers to the Agricultural Report alone. They move to strike out the parts within brackets and insert the parts in italics. That changes the number from 300,000 to 200,000. If we disagree to that amendment, the House resolution stands.

Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand the Senator to advocate the eliminations made by the House of the report as made by the Commissioner and leave out some of the most important subjects embraced in the report?

Mr. COCKRELL. The House does not eliminate anything. When that is done, I shall move to strike out the word "five" and insert the word "six," so as to provide for six hundred pages, and there is not then a particle of difference between the two.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have already made that motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Strike out "five" and insert "six," and then it will be precisely as the House resolution is except as to the number of pages of the report. The only difference is in the number of copies and the number of pages. The committee's amendment proposes 200,000 copies and six hundred pages; the House resolution proposes 300,000 copies and five hundred pages.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that a motion is now pending, made on my part, to amend the amendment of the committee in regard to the five hundred pages, restoring the six hundred.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand the Senator from Missouri is in favor of the biggest book and the most copies.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am in favor of 300,000 copies, the pages not to exceed six hundred.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is exactly the proposition I made.

Mr. SARGENT. That is the biggest book and the greatest number of copies, as I said. I have no doubt that the Agricultural Report is a valuable book, but it is impossible for us to print copies enough to supply every farmer in the United States. Three hundred thousand copies certainly will not do it. Some must be left unsupplied. Now the Committee on Printing desired to be reasonably economical while endeavoring to satisfy as far as possible the public demand; and while believing in the value of this book and that the Government should print it, they thought that two hundred thousand was a better limit than three hundred thousand.

There is another element to be considered besides the cost of the book, I will suggest to my friend from Missouri, who ordinarily is very economical and properly so, and that is that this extra one hundred thousand books go out in the mails and swell their bulk. We pay for carriage in railroad cars by weight, and by printing large amounts of these public documents, three hundred thousand instead of two hundred thousand, and twenty-five thousand in other cases instead of twenty thousand, and so on, we swell very much the cost of the railroad mail service to the Government of the United States. I do not wonder that with the liberal printing made of the public documents the Post-Office Department stands aghast at the gap there is between its receipts and the amount of its expenditures. It has been trying for years to close that gap. I think Congress does very much by the excessive amount of its printing to prevent the gap being closed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator from California will allow me a moment to correct a statement which he does not intend to make, I know, as to swelling the amount of mail matter over the railroads. He knows well that that is fixed by weight at certain dates; and the distribution of the Agricultural Reports may not (though it may) and most probably will not add one cent to the expenses of the Post-Office Department. But in addition to that, the amendment offered—and I understand the Senator from California to advocate it from the fact that he advocates the lowest number of Agricultural Reports—comes from the Committee on Printing and will cost the Government probably in mail service in dollars and cents and for printing as much as, if not more than, the House resolution which simply prints three hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report. The Committee on Printing of the Senate has seen proper to add to it the printing of another large and valuable book, which has no connection whatever with the Agricultural Report.

Mr. SARGENT. With that addition the resolution as reported from the Committee on Printing costs less than the resolution as it comes to us from the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A very trifling amount.

Mr. SARGENT. Fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars, if I recollect correctly the figuring which we made in committee. At any rate it costs less. As to the circumstance mentioned by my friend that we can possibly put these three hundred thousand books in between two weighings of mail matter on the railroads, that would be rather sharp practice. If we aimed at that it would be endeavoring to get the mail carried at a lower than a just rate, because between the two dates which the Government fixes for the weighing we would crowd in a large amount of matter; but the argument would not be good, though it would look toward taking an unfair advantage.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no; I did not mean that.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to do injustice to my friend; but it seems to me that is the calculation which he makes, though he may not intend it. But I referred not merely to the printing of an excessive number of Agricultural Reports, but of all the various public documents. I want to keep down the printing of documents generally, because the extra numbers of the documents we send out in fact swell the amount of mail matter which we have to pay for, and some of them must certainly be sent out at the period when the weighing is to take place.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest to my friend from California that he commence his discriminations in the matter of printing against some other class rather than this in the interest of agriculture, because so little is done in that interest that no one certainly can complain in regard to it until other printing of other kinds is dispensed with.

Mr. SARGENT. I was speaking generally with reference to the necessity of reducing the amount of printing done. I take issue with my friend, however, that we do nothing for agriculture. And I admit the importance of that branch of business to the prosperity of the country; I admit its merits and all the value which can be ascribed to it by the Senator; but Congress does more in favor of the agricultural interest than it does for any other interest whatever, directly and indirectly.

Mr. PADDOCK. Not specifically.

Mr. SARGENT. If an income tax is levied, it is levied in such a way that the principally agricultural States pay almost none of it, while manufacturing and mining States pay nearly all of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator certainly does not mean that the agricultural States do not pay the bulk of the revenue.

Mr. SARGENT. I mean to say that the taxation is so laid, so discriminating, for instance the income tax, that they pay almost none of it, and I could go on and cite other instances if necessary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What does the Senator mean by the income tax?

Mr. SARGENT. The income tax we levied during the war, and which an effort is now being made to revive again.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is none now.

Mr. SARGENT. There is none now; but the Senator from Nebraska says we have done nothing for agriculture; I say Congress has done much for that interest; and if Senators insist I can give other instances, and can give a long list. Wool-raising is an agricultural interest, and there is a discriminating tariff in favor of wool; and I can show you in reference to a great many other varieties of things which are protected—tobacco, domestic animals, &c., for instances——

Mr. WITHERS. I ask my friend to correct his statement that the agricultural States pay nothing to the revenue. By reference to the amount paid from the tax on tobacco, he will find that Kentucky and Virginia and other States producing tobacco pay very largely.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say that the agricultural States paid nothing in the way of revenue. My friends will insist on not understanding me. I did not say that. I illustrated by saying they did not pay the income tax, though I could illustrate it in a variety of other ways. If the Senator says that tobacco forms an exception, I admit that is an agricultural product and does pay a considerable tax. That, however, more than any other tax almost, comes out of the consumer. My State uses an immense amount of tobacco and raises very little, and we certainly pay——

Mr. WITHERS. The tax has to be paid by these States, and ought to be credited to the internal revenue paid by those States.

Mr. SARGENT. Primarily.

Mr. WITHERS. And there is now no income tax.

Mr. SARGENT. There is none now, but I was speaking about the legislation of Congress. What is to be said in reference to the taxation in favor of wool and many other agricultural products which I might mention were it worth while?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator——

Mr. SARGENT. Furthermore, we have done more. We keep up a bureau for the sole use of agriculture. We send out seeds by the hundred thousand dollars' worth. If the farming districts are desolated by locusts, then a special appropriation is made to furnish them seeds, not choice seeds for experiment, which is the ordinary purpose of the distribution by the Agricultural Department, but seeds are sent away in huge bagsful in order to give the agriculturists something to seed their farms again because the seed, crop, and all, have been destroyed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California what he thinks all the other industries of the country would amount to if it were not for the agricultural interest, which is the basis of all?

Mr. SARGENT. I am drawing no invidious discriminations. My friend himself started the topic.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is the basis of all the wealth of the world.

Mr. SARGENT. My friend himself started the topic by really insisting, in effect, that the great agricultural interest of the country, with its numerous representatives, had not influence enough upon the floor of Congress to get due protection and due consideration for that interest. I was trying to show him that he and his colleagues and those who represent the agricultural States are far more influential than he insists, by showing that over and over again, in every variety of form, they have secured legislation in favor of the agricultural interest.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think that fact has been fully demonstrated by legislation exactly. I think there are a number of Departments and a great many bureaus that are devoted to all the other industries of the country, and but one small, insignificant bureau is devoted to the interest of agriculture.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very sorry indeed to hear the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture speak of the Bureau of Agriculture as a small, insignificant bureau. I certainly would not think of putting it in that category. But if the Senator still insists that I go on and tell how the agricultural interest has been taken care of, I should like to refer to the commissions we send out in order to investigate the various worms, locusts, &c., that prey upon the crops of the farmer. Certainly that is not for the benefit of any other industry. I can show the Senator, if he wants me to do so, a long list of acts passed for the especial benefit of this interest, passed with my especial concurrence. I have been in favor of them all. But when gentlemen come in and make a poor mouth and say that this great interest cannot secure justice for itself, I say they do injustice to their own influence, and they do injustice to the facts.

Mr. PADDOCK. Why, Mr. President, the geological surveys, and the printing incident to those surveys of the mining country, which my friend represents in part, for a single year cost more than the printing of the Agricultural Report for half a dozen years sometimes.

Mr. SARGENT. No. The Senator is mistaken about that. The geological surveys, which are not for the benefit of mining, by the way, but just as much for the benefit of the agriculturist, are largely made up of reports on locusts, bugs, and other things which do injury to agricultural products. The geological survey, which points out arable land as well as geological formations, has no particular reference to mining, and the only time that Congress has ever done anything——

Mr. PADDOCK. Why, sir——

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will wait a moment till I finish my sentence.

Mr. PADDOCK. Surely I can be allowed to refer——

Mr. SARGENT. I call the Senator to order. I want to finish my sentence, and then I will yield to him.

I say the geological survey to which he refers has no special reference to mining. Professor Raymond, a single commissioner, was appointed some years ago, and for four or five years did make special reports on mining; but that was abolished. You may look through the whole list and you will not find with reference to the great mining interest that there has ever been any especial favor granted to it. It has never asked for it; it has never come here to the doors of Congress begging or demanding anything of the kind. I should like to ask the Senator, in his own language, what would become of the country if it was not for the mining interest? That is not the proper way to compare these things. The agricultural interest, of course, is a great interest, and so is the mining interest; but when a proposition comes here to print over a quarter of a million books, we may well look on the score of economy and ask whether it is needed or not. If you say you want a book for every farmer, then you want to make the number a million and a half probably, or two millions or three millions.

Mr. PADDOCK. No, sir; there is no such necessity as that.

Mr. SARGENT. Then why favor three hundred thousand farmers instead of two hundred thousand?

Mr. PADDOCK. It often happens that a single Agricultural Report serves one hundred people in a district. In sparsely settled communities, where they have no libraries and no means of intelligence except through that source, it is an invaluable book; a very small number may be circulated very widely, and they are very generally read.

Mr. SARGENT. It is a very valuable book, I think, and I think the Department is not insignificant, but a very valuable Department. Two hundred thousand copies are enough to furnish every library, public and private, in the country, and furnish every neighborhood. So the Committee on Printing thought; and therefore it proposed to reduce it to this number. But if this interest has been so much oppressed, if this interest is struggling for recognition, if this great agricultural interest with its thousand millions of production and its representatives in every State, mine as well as the Senator's, is to be oppressed by this Senate amendment, I trust my colleagues on the committee will not insist upon that oppression. I must say that my own feelings are moved by the pathetic appeal the Senator makes, and I do not know but that I should be willing to forego in behalf of this suffering interest the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of my friend from California the fact that there are about seven million voters in this country, and it seems to me that five hundred thousand Agricultural Reports distributed among that number of voters would be a small number. What we ought to do is to print a reasonable number.

Then as to encouraging the agricultural interest of the country, the tobacco interest and the distilled spirits of the country, which are indirectly an agricultural product, pay more than two-thirds of the internal revenue of this country. In round numbers, they pay about $100,000,000 internal revenue.

Mr. SARGENT. They have the market to themselves.

Mr. MERRIMON. I only submit these figures and insist that they show that the publication of five hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report, to be sent to the farmers, is not unreasonable. It is very moderate, and we ought not to hesitate a moment in doing that, and making it, if need be, contain six hundred pages.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator now ought to offer his amendment to increase the House resolution by two hundred thousand, because their proposition is only three hundred thousand.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am willing to do that.

Mr. SARGENT. In regard to the whisky and tobacco interests, who complain of the taxation they pay, the producers do pay it primarily, but the tariff makes an equality. They are protected by the tariff by the imposition of a heavier duty than the tax which is levied upon them.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is no product in this country of any kind that pays taxes like whisky and tobacco.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit that there is a heavy revenue tax on those articles; but there is also a heavy protection by way of discriminating duties enormous and in excess of the amount which they pay.

Mr. MERRIMON. How many agricultural products are so protected?

Mr. SARGENT. Whisky and tobacco, which the Senators have referred to, wool, &c.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask if there are not much heavier discriminating duties in favor of many articles which contribute nothing to the internal revenue.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think there is.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator from California——

Mr. SARGENT. But, even if there is, I do not know that that makes any difference to my argument. If, however, the agricultural interest that is being scrambled for here is the whisky interest or the tobacco interest, I retire from the contest, because I know nobody can stand up against that force. I thought when the Senator from Nebraska referred to the agricultural interest, he referred to the general agricultural interest of the country, the raising of wheat and general vegetable products.

Mr. WITHERS. My friend will recognize the fact that he himself is responsible for the introduction of these two articles and the specification of them, because he asserted that the agricultural interest contributed little or nothing to the support of the Government.

Mr. SARGENT. Oh, no.

Mr. WITHERS. And by way of rejoinder we cited to him these great items which contribute so largely, some three-fourths or four-fifths of the whole revenue derived by the Government from internal taxation.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend from Virginia will look at the RECORD to-morrow morning, he will find that I was speaking of an income tax in reply to the Senator from Nebraska who said that Congress never legislated in behalf of the agricultural interest. I said, on the contrary, take the case of a levy of an income tax, which was collected for years and is proposed to be levied again—that this showed that legislation had discriminated in favor of the agricultural community, as the agricultural States paid almost none of it. It showed that Congress did sometimes legislate in their behalf. My friend from West Virginia misunderstood me and supposing I spoke of revenue in general brought in whisky and tobacco.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from California objects to the number of copies ordered by the House. My idea is, that if we ought to have any at all, we ought to have enough to distribute at least among the different agricultural societies in the various States. There are over one hundred counties, for example, in the State of Kentucky. We have an agricultural society in nearly every one of them, with a president, vice-president, and directors. Each county has such a society. These are the men who want the Agricultural Reports. They have their meetings sometimes monthly, always three or four times a year; and the only valuable thing they get from the Agricultural Department is a copy of its annual report; and we ought to have at least enough of the reports printed to be kept in the libraries of the societies to enable the people who go to their meetings and who belong to them to see the improvements, if any, that are made by this bureau of the Government.

I might go with the Senator from California in striking at the seeds they are supplying and which they are sending themselves all over the country; and I wish they would not give us one. I think they cost us during the spring of the year from a dollar to a dollar and a half a day in postage stamps in writing to our constituents to say we cannot get their seeds. I would stop that great waste. If we send these volumes to the agricultural societies, they can receive them and test the value of them. As I said, we ought to have enough at least to furnish the officers of the societies in each State with what they want.

I understand under the House resolution I shall only receive about five hundred copies, and my colleague about five hundred, which would be less than ten to a county, leaving out the grangers altogether. I want to stand by the House resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. How many Representatives are there from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. Ten.

Mr. SARGENT. There are four thousand more at least. It is a pretty large distribution.

Mr. BECK. I rose simply to say that if we would cut off all the useless things in the Agricultural Department we might print more of these reports. If there is anything that is a nuisance it is the pretended distribution of seeds when you can send to but few and have a thousand applications, and then be quarreling with the Department, as I have been doing, because its head was distributing them himself by selecting agents. He would not trust Senators and Representatives, but he selected people throughout the country to magnify his own bureau. If that can be stopped I shall be glad.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I concur with the desire expressed by the Senator from California that there should be a restriction of the amount of printing ordered by the Senate. I think we do entirely too much printing. There are a great many books printed here in larger number than is necessary. Take for instance the President's message and accompanying documents. There are large numbers put to the credit of every Senator, whose constituents would be insulted if he would send them to them. They are valuable documents for reference for certain classes of persons, and only for certain classes of persons; and so it is that very many books are published which are of comparatively little value.

This Agricultural Report, however, is prized by the agricultural community. Whether it is valuable or not valuable, they are anxious to have it. For myself, I believe that many of the statements contained in these reports are not correct, and therefore that they have no real intrinsic value; nevertheless they are books which agriculturists of the country desire, as we all know from the applications we have for them. I do not think that three hundred thousand of that report, if we print any, is too many, and I am perfectly willing, therefore, to vote for the number proposed by the House of Representatives of this particular book.

Now, with reference to the advantages to the agriculturists of the country from the establishment of this bureau, I might differ very essentially from gentlemen who have spoken in regard to that. Upon the whole I question the propriety of maintaining a bureau of that character in this Government. It costs I suppose nearly half a million dollars to run that Department in the appropriations that are made for it and the publication of its reports and the pay which it must necessarily give to the agents who make up these books. I should suppose that half a million dollars was a moderate estimate for running that Department, and I question very much whether it confers benefit to one-half that amount on the entire country. Now, we walk up there through a beautiful park, to look at it. There is a fine area of ground; there is a fine brick house; the walks are splendid; the building is magnificent. It is certainly very beautiful to the eye. But then there is not one out of twenty of the people of this country who ever can see it. Is that kept up to gratify those who live in the city of Washington or those who occasionally come here, that they may look at that magnificent Department of this Government? The great body of the people never see it, and the great body of the people never see its reports, and the great body of the people never see the seeds it sends out. While it may confer some advantages, I question very much whether it pays to run that bureau at all. While we have it, however, I am in favor of publishing its reports and sending them out. I do not believe the number of three hundred thousand is too much; but I join with the Senator from California in curtailing the expenses of the Senate in printing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired and the Chair calls up the unfinished business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope we shall be able to pass on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is House bill No. 805.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator having that bill in charge will permit the bill to be laid aside for a few minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. We can get a vote on this resolution in a few minutes now.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] wishes to address the Senate at this time on the regular order of business, and I do not feel at liberty to give way, for that reason.

Mr. PADDOCK. I feel certain that the Senator from Ohio will yield for a few minutes until we pass this resolution, on account of his great interest in the subject of agriculture generally.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe I was recognized when the Chair announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Ohio will allow the regular order to be passed over informally for a few minutes until we can pass this resolution. I think the debate is exhausted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better insist on the regular order.

Mr. MATTHEWS. In deference to the overshadowing importance of the agricultural interest to the country I am willing to yield for five or six minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is willing to yield for five or six minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Say fifteen.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Well, fifteen.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to offer amendments——

Mr. ANTHONY. Do not let us have any morning business now. This introduction of morning business out of order has become very prevalent in the Senate, and it is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. This thing of calling up measures in the morning hour and supplanting morning business is becoming quite prevalent too, and renders it necessary for Senators who desire to introduce morning business to ask leave to do it out of order. The Senator from Rhode Island has called up this matter; I had these amendments ready to introduce when he got up his other matter; now I offer these amendments to the river and harbor appropriation bill, and I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The amendments will be received and referred, if there be no objection. The House concurrent resolution is continued before the Senate, the Chair understands.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish only to say a few words on the facts. I have no desire to prolong the discussion, and I hope that we shall dispose of the resolution within fifteen minutes. My friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] states that the cost of the Agricultural Department is half a million a year. That is only his supposition. I will state that the actual cost of the Agricultural Department is less than a quarter of a million. But that is a matter of very little consequence. The real question is, shall we print two hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report, or three hundred thousand, as the House has sent the resolution over to us. Three hundred thousand is the number that has been printed for several years. The House has passed the usual resolution. The Committee on Printing of the Senate, instead of reporting that resolution back to the Senate upon its own merits, saw fit to change it and add to it the printing of other documents, which I think is rather unusual. Three hundred thousand copies is the least number that I believe ought to be printed of the Agricultural Report, and I hope the Senate will adhere to the House resolution as it came over in that respect.

Again, the Senate Committee on Printing have given for the use of the Senate thirty thousand copies, when the House resolution gave to Senators fifty-six thousand copies. In other words, there are twenty-six thousand copies cut off from the use of Senators by the committee's amendment; and therefore I hope it will be rejected.

Now, one word in regard to the necessity of the printing of these reports. It is a well-known fact that more than half the people of this entire nation are engaged in agriculture; and it is another well-known fact that for the use of agriculture there is not, in proportion to the number engaged in it, one book in five that are printed for other Departments. The Agricultural Department has been neglected, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has said, and if time admitted I have figures to prove that there has been less done to foster agriculture than any other pursuit whatever. Agriculture pays nearly the entire internal revenue. It has been stated here that $100,000,000 of the $118,000,000 comes from agriculture. That is a fact. So, too, in regard to the revenue which comes from customs duties. The agricultural communities pay one-half that taxation in an indirect way; and they are entitled to consideration.

I hope the Senate will not agree to reduce the number of Agricultural Reports for the purpose of printing another book that may be of importance, but it should stand upon its own merits, and not upon those of the Agricultural Report. The two ought not to be placed together.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move to strike out the word "five," where it occurs in the text of the House resolution, and insert "six," which will change the number of pages from five hundred to six hundred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to perfect the text of the House resolution. The first question is on that amendment to strike out "five" and insert "six" in the original resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is there not another amendment pending? I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to move two amendments, first to strike out "five" and insert "six," then to strike out "two" and insert "three."

Mr. COCKRELL. We accomplish the purpose by disagreeing to the committee's amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Five" has been stricken out and "six" inserted in the House resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let us know how the question stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution of the House of Representatives, as just amended, reads as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877, 224,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 56,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed six hundred.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, is the question on agreeing to this as read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Printing, striking out and inserting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As I understand it, all who are in favor of the House resolution, with the amendment just read, vote against the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. The question is on the first branch of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Chair would state it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first branch of the committee's amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is striking ont "three" and inserting "two," so as to make the number two hundred thousand.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out all after the word "printed" in the House resolution and insert:

Two hundred thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877, 150,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 30,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed six hundred.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate disagree to that branch of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the residue of the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know now how much of this committee amendment has been disagreed to, down to what line.

Mr. ANTHONY. The first paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first paragraph.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it leaves the matter as it stood in the House resolution, three hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report and five hundred pages.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution as it stands.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has been read; it need not be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report further to amend——

Mr. COCKRELL. Before we pass from this I desire to amend the other, and that is in regard to the number. Two hundred and twenty-four thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives and fifty-six thousand for the use of the Senate is the House resolution. I move to strike out "two hundred and twenty-four" and insert "two hundred and ten," and strike out "fifty-six" and insert "seventy."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order yet.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator from Missouri, who is aiming at the same thing that I am, will not do that, for it will only lead to a contest between the Houses. Fifty-six thousand to the Senate is much more liberal than our committee has been.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have already rejected what the Senate committee propose. It is only one-fourth to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, do not have a contest with the House about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better leave it as it is, if the number is to be three hundred thousand. The House have always had a larger proportion of the Agricultural Report per capita; and of other documents the Senate have a larger proportion than the House. If we keep the total number fixed by the House, we had better agree to the House apportionment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island; and I hope my friend from Missouri will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his amendment. It will only lead us into a contest with the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. As the Senator from Vermont has decided it is out of order, I presume the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt the Chair will, because the question is on the balance of the amendment which is not to strike out anything but merely an addition, and that is to be put first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The committee's amendment comes first; then the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be in order. The question is on agreeing to the latter paragraph of the amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri now moves to strike out and insert——

Mr. SARGENT and others. No; he does not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. In deference to the wishes of so many Senators, I will not press it; but I think two Senators from a State ought to have one-fourth as many copies of these books as the members of the House from the State.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of most documents the per capita proportion of the Senate is larger than of the House; but in regard to this document a preference has always been given to the House.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I wish to know how it stands. What is the number?

Mr. PADDOCK. Three hundred thousand copies of six hundred pages each.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will state my understanding of the resolution as it now stands if it is adopted, and that is this: it is three hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report, as it came from the House, and six hundred pages; and then it includes the amendment as to the printing of the colonial records.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now we all understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I submitted yesterday a resolution that went to the Committee on Printing. I offer it now as an amendment to this resolution. I will explain very briefly what it means, and I think it will meet with no opposition. The President communicated to us, in answer to a Senate resolution, a short time since a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture treating on the diseases of swine and other domestic animals. Of that a small number was printed, a very small number. I move an amendment to this resolution for the printing of twenty thousand additional copies of that communication.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will my friend allow me? I think I can explain the matter, and save him the necessity of moving his resolution as an amendment. The addition of one hundred pages, as I understand, will put the document the Senator refers to in the Agricultural Report.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If the Senator knows that——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is generally understood.

Mr. COCKRELL. I introduced the resolution under which the report in regard to the diseases of swine was printed, and that report is not as full in the pamphlet form as it will be found in the Agricultural Report, and it does not have a number of drawings and plates exemplifying the stages of the disease, &c., which will be in the Agricultural Report.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator knows that?

Mr. COCKRELL. I know that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Very well. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that is the reason I wanted the five hundred stricken out and six hundred pages inserted. If it were not for that being incorporated in the report, there would be no necessity for over five hundred pages, but it is the addition of that investigation of the diseases of swine and domestic animals that has caused the necessity for six hundred pages.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is entirely sufficient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the House resolution as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move in the second section this, which I think on explanation there will be no objection to: instead of forty-five hundred and fifty-five copies of the Colonial Charters, to make the number five thousand, and to add, after the clause providing for the distribution, "four hundred and forty-five copies for the Congressional Library for exchanges."

This is a book of extraordinary historic value. Probably no work of the kind has been prepared in this country for years which contains so much of importance to the constitutional history of this country. Now the Librarian of the Congressional Library will be able to exchange with other libraries abroad and at home when he has the copies in his possession, on very advantageous terms, to obtain old and rare books, which are not books that have a market price and do not come within the ordinary expenditure. I move that amendment, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. As it seems to be uncertain how long this subject is to take, and as the Senator from Ohio yielded for fifteen minutes and I promised to call for the regular order at the expiration of that time, I now do so.

Mr. HOAR. I think, if the Senator from Indiana will allow this amendment to be adopted, it will dispose of the whole resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. If it only occupies a minute or two, with the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I will allow it to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the resolution of the Senate for printing an edition of the Colonial Charters and Constitutions of the United States, sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence February 5, 1878.

The order was agreed to.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, we have before us the bill of the House of Representatives proposing to repeal all that part of the act of January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

We have also the proposition of the Committee on Finance, reported as a substitute for that repeal. On the 10th of April I myself gave notice of an amendment intended to be proposed, at the proper time, to the resumption-repeal bill, which has been printed and referred to the Committee of Finance, and which at the proper moment I intend to offer as an amendment, by way of substitute, for all the pending propositions. This proposition was originally introduced by me on the 8th of last November in the form of an original and independent bill, supplementary to the act to provide for the resumption of specie payments of January 14, 1875, and was then referred to the Finance Committee.

We have before us, also, House bill No. 4663, to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes, referred a few days ago to the Finance Committee.

These various propositions open for discussion the whole question of the currency. I trust that that discussion will be thorough and complete. I hope it will lead to such a settlement by Congress at the present session as will be so satisfactory to the general public opinion of the country that it may suffice to close all popular agitation upon the question. Much as the country needs and desires repose upon that and all other subjects of agitation, political and monetary, calculated to affect the course of business, I am satisfied that it cannot be attained otherwise than by a candid, fair, thorough, and complete examination and discussion of the whole subject. The question has taken a deep hold on the public mind. It will be discussed, if not here, then elsewhere, in the newspapers, in primary assemblies, in political conventions, in private meetings, in social clubs, and even in the family circle.

The country is suffering from a paralysis of industry. It affects injuriously and keenly every interest. Every one is conscious that something is wrong. Everybody believes that something ought to be done to cure it. Every one is inquiring, thinking, talking; and almost every one believes himself in possession of the specific which he is ready to prescribe as the sure remedy for all the acknowledged evils of our situation. While such remains the condition of the public mind, it is not wise to ignore it. We must meet the question; we must consider it; we must debate it; we must try to solve it; we must make the effort to settle it. It is in this spirit that I address the Senate to-day. It is in this spirit that I submit the propositions which I shall have to offer. Every Senator is required to have an opinion, for he is bound to vote; and as he must vote upon his own responsibility so as to give wise direction to the public policy he ought to be able to furnish the reasons and grounds on which he rests his vote. Under a sense of this responsibility I have given this delicate and important subject the most anxious and careful consideration of which I am able. I have not thought that the science of finance could be acquired by intuition. I have endeavored to inform myself of the views of those who are entitled to be considered authorities. I have endeavored to study and understand our present condition in the light of our past experience and the experience of other countries, both past and contemporaneous, and have been willing to listen to and accept suggestions from whatever quarter that seemed to me to be reasonable and well founded.

The first proposition to be considered is that contained in the House bill for the repeal of the substance of the resumption act of 1875. That is the main question on which all the other propositions depend. It is the question, if these propositions are not accepted, which will recur and on which we will be required to record our votes, yea and nay.

The substance of the resumption act consists in that provision which requires that on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50; and in the further provision which, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized and required, authorizes him to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, bonds of the United States described in the refunding act of July 14, 1870, bearing interest either at 5, 4½ or 4 per cent. per annum. The question is, shall this be repealed without condition and without qualification. The question is, shall the policy expressed in this statute and pursued hitherto now be reversed, or shall it be prosecuted to its consummation, either by the means already in existence or by such further provisions of law as shall perfect it.

In one aspect the answer to this question may depend upon what is meant in law by that "redemption" of the legal-tender notes which it was intended to secure on and after the 1st of January next. On this question there is division of opinion. Some maintain—and that seems to be the opinion implied in the preamble to the House bill, which recites it as if the act authorized the cancellation of the greenback currency as the necessary consequence of this redemption—some, I say, contend that the redemption in coin on and after the 1st of January, 1879, of the legal-tender currency is an extinction of it without the power and authority of law for its continuous reissue.

On the other hand, it is argued that it was the intention of the resumption act to reduce the amount of the greenback currency in circulation to the sum of $300,000,000, and not further; and that although the act of redemption thereafter to take place by the exchange of legal-tender notes on presentation for coin does imply ex vi termini the extinction for the time being of the obligation expressed in these notes thus returned to the possession of the United States, that nevertheless that temporary extinction of the obligation is not inconsistent with the right to renew it by reissuing the notes from time to time and thus keeping them alive and afloat as a part of the permanent currency of the nation. This is the view taken by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, who holds that after he has commenced the work of redemption under this act, and although there is no provision of law in this statute authorizing him to reissue notes so redeemed, yet there remain on the statute-book, unrepealed, other provisions of law giving him that authority. The resumption act of 1875 only repeals such provisions of law as are inconsistent with its own, and it is not inconsistent with the provision requiring the redemption of legal-tender notes, on presentation, in coin that the Secretary should be authorized by law to reissue them again from time to time as the exigencies of the public interests may require. Section 3582 of the Revised Statutes declares that—

> The authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency, by retiring and canceling United States notes, is suspended.

And it is provided in section 3579 that—

> When any United States notes are returned to the Treasury, they may be reissued, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public interest may require.

The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the effect of this latter section upon the question is stated by him in his annual report for 1877, submitted to Congress, as follows:

> The Secretary is of the opinion that, under this section, notes, when redeemed after the 1st of January, 1879, if the amount outstanding is not in excess of $300,000,000, may be reissued as the exigencies of the public service may require. A note redeemed with coin is in the Treasury and subject to the same law as if received for taxes, or as a bank-note when redeemed by the corporation issuing it. The authority to reissue it does not depend upon the mode in which it is returned to the Treasury. But this construction is controverted, and should be settled by distinct provisions of law. It should not be open to doubt or dispute. The decision of this question by Congress involves not merely the construction of existing law, but the public policy of maintaining in circulation United States notes, either with or without the legal-tender clause. These notes are of great public convenience. They circulate readily; are of universal credit; are a debt of the people without interest; are protected by every possible safeguard against counterfeiting; and, when redeemable in coin at the demand of the holder, form a paper currency as good as has yet been devised. It is conceded that a certain amount can, with the aid of an ample reserve in coin, be always maintained in circulation. Should not the benefit of this circulation inure to the people, rather than to corporations, either

State or national? The Government has ample facility for the collection, custody, and care of the coin reserves of the country. It is a safer custodian of such reserves than a multitude of scattered banks can be.

My own opinion agrees with that of the Secretary. I believe that construing section 3579 of the Revised Statutes together with the resumption act of 1875 the two are entirely consistent. There is no express declaration in the resumption act that notes once redeemed may not be reissued. There is no inference to that effect which can be drawn from the language of the law except that which is implied necessarily in the meaning of the word "redeemed;" and although it may be said that the natural and usual meaning of the word "redeem" is to extinguish by payment, that, nevertheless, is consistent with the right to renew the vitality of the extinguished obligation by a new issue. The redemption does not extinguish the note redeemed more effectually when accomplished by means of payment in coin than when accomplished by a receipt in payment of a debt due to the Government, and the authority to reissue has been exerted constantly in respect to obligations thus extinguished.

In respect to the fractional currency required to be redeemed by the first section of the resumption act no similar provision applies. That becomes extinguished by the redemption, and there is no provision of law for reissuing fractional currency. Section 3579 only applies to what are technically known as United States notes, and fractional currency does not come under that denomination.

It further appears from other legislation upon the same subject that when Congress manifestly intended the absolute extinction of redeemed currency they used language admitting of no doubt and inconsistent with the idea of reissue.

As, for instance, in the act of April 12, 1866, the proviso declares—

That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month—

So in the act of March 2, 1867, it is declared—

That for the purpose of redeeming and retiring any compound-interest notes outstanding the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue temporary-loan certificates.

So in the act of July 25, 1868, it is declared—

That for the sole purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the compound-interest notes outstanding the Secretary shall issue temporary-loan certificates.

While, therefore, I agree with the Secretary in the opinion that after the 1st of January, 1879, existing provisions of law authorize him to reissue Treasury notes then redeemed, I also agree with him that so important an authority ought not to be left to construction and to inference, but that express provision of law ought now to be made to remove any doubt on that subject.

That opinion, however, I cannot expect to be universally adopted. There are two grounds independent of the mere question of construction on which it will be contested. It is claimed by some that in the present condition of the country in time of peace, as a mere matter of policy in establishing, maintaining, and regulating a national currency, Congress has no constitutional authority to authorize the issue of Treasury notes to circulate as money and with the legal-tender quality.

In the second place it would be maintained by a certain school of finance that, whatever may be the power of Congress in the premises, the creation by its direct authority of a national currency of Treasury notes is so dangerous and liable to abuse and full of peril and threatening to all that stability which is essential to public and private credit and the whole industrial organization of the country, which is necessarily built on private credit, that the idea of maintaining as a permanent part of our financial system the issue of legal-tender notes ought not as a matter of expediency and wisdom to be entertained for a moment; but that at the earliest practicable moment the legal tender ought to be redeemed in coin and retired and canceled, and be reissued no more forever.

First, as to the constitutional power. It cannot and will not be denied that, for its own convenience under the constitutional authority to levy and collect taxes, to borrow money, and pay the public debt, Congress may lawfully issue Treasury notes; and if, to give them greater efficiency as an instrumentality for exercising an acknowledged power of Congress, it is deemed best in its discretion to give them the form and similitude of notes calculated to circulate as money, the argument is irresistible that Congress may lawfully do so. No one doubts that they may be made receivable by the Government in payment of every obligation due to it, for that is the very object of their creation. If, in addition, Congress may determine that it be necessary and proper in the exercise of this power to increase their usefulness and efficiency by making them receivable by individuals from the Government it seems impossible to frame an argument against its authority so to do, and equally difficult to draw the line of distinction between that power and the power to make them receivable by individuals in payment of individual debts.

In my judgment, there is a much broader ground on which this power can safely rest. I believe that it is the duty as well as the exclusive right of the National Government to furnish to the people, either directly or indirectly, a national currency; and if it can do it indirectly through the medium of one or more national banks, a fortiori it may do it directly by the issue of its own notes. On what ground, may I ask, rest the present existence and lawful authority of the national banks to issue their notes to circulate as money to constitute the currency of the country? If the United States Government cannot issue or create representative paper money by direct legislation, issuing from the Treasury itself, how can it impart to corporations created by itself that power which it is claimed the Constitution has denied to it? Can it give to another that which it has not itself? Can the stream rise higher than the source? The maxim of the law is qui facit per alium facit per se. If there be no original power, from what source can there be any derived? The national banks are agents merely. Who is their principal, and how does it come that they can do what is denied to the principal from whom they derive all their power? It is not irreconcilable with this view that State governments created banks authorized to issue their own notes to circulate as money, while the Constitution of the United States prohibited the States themselves from emitting bills of credit, under which denomination circulating notes were decided to be included. There the positive prohibition of the Federal Constitution operated upon the States—not to take away, as it was held, their power to create corporations with banking powers, but only upon the direct action of the States themselves to issue their own bills. If there was any lack of logic it was in the original decision by which the lawfulness of State banks was first established.

But the question of the power of Congress has been the subject of express adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Osborn vs. The United States Bank, 9 Wheaton, 872. Justice Johnson, dissenting from the majority on the question of jurisdiction, explained the relation between the Bank of the United States, whose constitutionality was then in question, and the General Government; and after speaking of its functions as a part of the administration of the National Government, in its fiscal transactions, he says:

Had its effects, however, and the views of its framers been confined exclusively to its fiscal uses, it is more than probable that this suit and the laws in which it originated would never have had existence. But it is well known that with that object was combined another, of a very general and not less important character.

The expiration of the charter of the former bank led to State creations of banks; each new bank increased the facilities of creating others; and the necessities of the General Government, both to make use of the State banks for their deposits and to borrow largely of all who would lend to them, produced that rage for multiplying banks which, aided by the emoluments derived to the States in their creation and the many individual incentives which they developed, soon inundated the country with a new description of bills of credit, against which it was obvious that the provisions of the Constitution opposed no adequate inhibition.

A specie-paying bank, with an overwhelming capital and the whole aid of the Government deposits, presented the only resource to which the Government could resort to restore that power over the currency of the country which the framers of the Constitution evidently intended to give to Congress alone. But this necessarily involved a restraint upon individual cupidity and the exercise of State power; and, in the nature of things, it was hardly possible for the mighty effort necessary to put down an evil spread so wide and arrived to such maturity to be made without embodying against it an immense moneyed combination, which could not fail of making its influence to be felt wherever its claimances could reach or its industry and wealth be brought to operate.

The power to control the national currency and restrain the individual and separate action of the States, and to make the action of Congress exclusive, which Mr. Justice Johnson thus describes as being exerted by the creation of the old Bank of the United States has been exerted for the same purpose and with the same effect in later days in a different way. For the purpose of effectually preventing the maintenance of any bank currency other than that issued under the direct authority of the General Government, Congress passed on the 13th of July, 1866, (14 Statutes at Large, 146,) an act the second clause of the ninth section of which enacts that—

Every national-banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association, used for circulation and paid out by them after the 1st day of August, 1866, and such tax shall be assessed and paid in such a manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The constitutional authority of Congress to pass such an act was the question decided in the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wallace, 548, in which the opinion of the court was pronounced by the then Chief-Justice Chase.

In delivering the opinion of the court, he said:

But there is another answer, which vindicates equally the wisdom and the power of Congress.

It cannot be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress; and it is settled by the uniform practice of the Government and by repeated decisions that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit. It is not important here to decide whether the quality of legal tender in payment of debts can be constitutionally imparted to these bills; it is enough to say that there can be no question of the power of the Government to emit them, to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself, to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce, to provide for their redemption, to make them a currency uniform in value and description and convenient and useful for circulation. These powers until recently were only partially and occasionally exercised. Lately, however, they have been called into full activity, and Congress has undertaken to supply a currency for the entire country.

The methods adopted for the supply of this currency were briefly explained in the first part of this opinion. It now consists of coin, of United States notes, and of the notes of the national banks. Both descriptions of notes may be properly described as bills of credit, for both are furnished by the Government; both are issued on the credit of the Government; and the Government is responsible for the redemption of both; primarily as to the first description, and immediately upon the default of the bank, as to the second. When these bills shall be made convertible into coin, at the will of the holder, this currency will, perhaps, satisfy the wants of the community, in respect to a circulating medium, as perfectly as any mixed currency that can be devised.

Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile.

In the light of subsequent judicial history this opinion of Chief-Justice Chase is exceedingly significant. In the first place, it is to be observed that he speaks of the redemption of the United States notes while still using them as a permanent part of the national currency. It was clearly, therefore, not his opinion that the redemption of such notes prevented their reissue. He evidently used the word "redemption" as legally equivalent to convertible into coin at the will of the holder, with the power on the part of the Government to reissue them again as new evidences of its obligation and as a permanent part of the national currency.

In the next place, it is to be observed that while the Chief-Justice reserved a decision as to whether the quality of legal tender in payment of debts could be constitutionally imparted to such notes, there is no implication arising upon the opinion that if such a decision had been necessary in that case it would not have been given in the affirmative. Indeed, such a decision is but the next necessary step in the line of his own logic. It seems to me impossible for any one to maintain his reasoning in support of the right of Congress to tax out of existence all other notes intended for circulation as money than those issued by the authority of the United States and not at the same time hold that Congress may do anything else that in its discretion may be proper and necessary for the purpose of accomplishing that result. The Chief-Justice declares that to provide a currency for the whole country is merely the exercise on the part of Congress of undisputed constitutional power; and that in the exercise of that power it cannot be questioned that Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. So that whatever legislation is appropriate to the purpose of providing a national currency, Congress may legitimately exercise; and if, in the opinion of Congress, to do so it becomes necessary to make that currency a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, I do not see how the conclusion can be avoided, upon the reasoning of this case, that Congress may rightfully so do.

Accordingly, in the legal-tender cases, 12 Wallace, 544, Mr. Justice Strong, referring to this decision upon the 10 per cent. tax on State bank-notes, said:

It is not easy to see why, if State bank-notes can be taxed out of existence for the purposes of indirectly making United States notes more useful for commercial purposes, the same end may not be secured directly by making them a legal tender.

And in the same case, on page 560, Mr. Justice Bradley said——

Mr. BAYARD. Will it interrupt the honorable Senator if I ask him whether, in the same volume of Wallace's reports in which the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno is reported, the opinion of Chief-Justice Chase in the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold is not also contained?

Mr. MATTHEWS. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. And whether he does not there expressly deny the power of the Congress of the United States to make its notes a legal tender for the payment of private debts?

Mr. MATTHEWS. He does.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know whether the honorable Senator in reading the opinion in Veazie Bank vs. Fenno adverted to the express exception by the court of the power of legal tender in the catalogue of powers there contained as being vested in the Congress.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I said the court reserved that question; that is, reserved any decision on that question.

Mr. BAYARD. That is to say, they made an expression of exclusion against that power.

Mr. MATTHEWS. They said "without expressing any opinion on that."

Mr. BAYARD. And in the same volume of reports, an opinion delivered by the same judge, the Chief-Justice, directly and expressly denies the power in Congress to make its notes a legal tender.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I have already said so, and have already demonstrated that he could not have done it without violating the logic of his own decision in the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I concur with him that, if the reasoning of Chief-Justice Chase in the case which he has read of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno is correct, then I believe that the application of that reasoning now made by the Senator is also correct.

Mr. MATTHEWS. That is my proposition.

Mr. HILL. But I do not believe the reasoning by the Chief-Justice in the case referred to is correct, and I do not believe that Congress has power to use the taxing power or any other power to prohibit the States from chartering banks, or to prohibit the banks chartered by the States from issuing a circulation, and I desire to ask the Senator does he believe the reasoning of Chief-Justice Chase in the case referred to is good reasoning?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I do.

Mr. HILL. I differ with the Senator there.

Mr. MATTHEWS. And I shall proceed to maintain it. In the legal-tender cases, in 12 Wallace, page 560, Mr. Justice Bradley says:

No one doubts at the present day nor has ever seriously doubted that the power of the Government to emit bills exists. It has been exercised by the Government without question for a large portion of its history. This being conceded, the incidental power of giving such bills the quality of legal tender follows almost as a matter of course.

I hold it to be the prerogative of every government not restrained by its constitution to anticipate its resources by the issue of exchequer bills, bills of credit, bonds, stock, or a banking apparatus. Whether those issues shall or shall not be receivable in payment of private debts is an incidental matter in the discretion of such government unless restrained by constitutional prohibition.

And on page 562 the same judge further says:

Another ground of the power to issue Treasury notes or bills is the necessity of providing a proper currency for the country, and especially of providing for the failure or disappearance of the ordinary currency in times of financial pressure and threatened collapse of commercial credit. Currency is a national necessity. The operations of the Government, as well as private transactions, are wholly dependent upon it. The State governments are prohibited from making money or issuing bills. Uniformity of money was one of the objects of the Constitution. The coinage of money and regulation of its value are conferred upon the General Government exclusively. That Government has also the power to issue bills. It follows, as a matter of necessity, as a consequence of these various provisions, that it is specially the duty of the General Government to provide a national currency. The States cannot do it except by the charter of local banks, and that remedy, if strictly legitimate and constitutional, is inadequate, fluctuating, uncertain, and insecure, and operates with all the partiality to local interests which it was the very object of the Constitution to avoid. But regarded as a duty of the General Government, it is strictly in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, as well as in line with the national necessities.

It is sometimes argued as if this eminent judge had based his opinion of the constitutionality of the legal-tender quality of the Treasury notes upon the exigencies of war and had declared in another part of this opinion that it could not exist or be exerted under any other contingency. The following extract from his opinion, on page 567, will show that that is not a correct inference. He says:

It follows as another corollary from the views which I have expressed that the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while a mere incidental one to that of issuing the notes themselves, and to one of the forms of borrowing money, is nevertheless a power not to be resorted to except upon extraordinary and pressing occasions, such as war or other public exigencies of great gravity and importance; and should be no longer exerted than all the circumstances of the case demand.

I do not say that it is a war power or that it is only to be called into exercise in time of war, for other public exigencies may arise in the history of a nation which may make it expedient and imperative to exercise it. But of the occasions when and of the times how long it shall be exercised and in force, it is for the legislative department of the Government to judge. Feeling sensibly the judgments and wishes of the people that department cannot long (if it is proper to suppose that within its sphere it ever can) misunderstand the business interests and just rights of the community.

I feel justified, then, on grounds both of reason and of authority in maintaining the conclusion that Congress in its discretion has constitutional power to create a national currency of Treasury notes which shall be receivable in payment of all debts and dues, both public and private, as a legal tender.

Whether it be safe or expedient to exert this constitutional power by providing a national currency either in whole or in part consisting of Treasury notes with the quality of legal tender, is the next question. On that question, as I have already said, opinions are divided. There is one school of finance which believes it to be unwise and inexpedient. Its disciples urge with pertinacity and earnestness that Congress ought to compel as speedily as practicable the withdrawal from circulation of all its Treasury notes by redeeming them in coin, and allowing whatever vacuum may thereby be created in the circulating medium of the country to be supplied by the normal operations of the free-banking system extended under the provisions of existing law at will by all who choose to engage in the business and according to the demands of business in every locality throughout the United States. The danger which menaces us in the view of this theory of national currency from the issue of Treasury notes directly by the Government is that the supply of currency is thus made dependent upon popular caprice and clamor as represented in the National Congress. The apprehension seems to be that Congress will not be able to impose upon itself or upon the people any fixed restraint of law prescribing the maximum of national currency authorized to be issued, and that the whole business interests of the country will be in perpetual terror from threatened changes in the volume and amount of the currency affecting and changing from day to day the prices and values of property and labor, and thus keeping all things in a condition of perpetual unrest and uncertainty.

I am unable to sympathize with this view. I think it is an unintelligent fear. I see no ground for such an apprehension. I can appreciate no reason which is likely to influence Congress to make from time to time by law and changes of law arbitrary alterations in the amount and volume of the currency. What has been our experience? The original maximum fixed by the act of June 30, 1864, of $400,000,000 of permanent circulation has never been extended; and I see no reasons for thinking that the representatives of the people in Congress may not as safely be trusted with the discretion to determine the volume of currency necessary for the needs of the nation as to leave the amount to be determined from time to time by those capricious and unregulated tendencies of popular caprice represented in all speculative movements by that demand for additional accommodations and discounts from private banks which in times of such excitement feed the very fever which begets them and bring upon the country, as they have brought upon the country in the whole history of banking operations, periodical inflations followed by periodical revulsions and bankruptcies. The danger of instability in the volume of paper money is much greater in my judgment when it is left to that private manipulation which is dictated by the joint avarice of lender and borrower than when left to that wider and better public opinion represented in national legislation.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for 1877, says:

The Secretary ventures to express the opinion that the best currency for the people of the United States would be a carefully limited amount of United States notes, promptly redeemable on presentation in coin, and supported by ample reserves of coin, and supplemented by a system of national banks, organized under general laws, free and open to all, with power to issue circulating notes secured by United States bonds deposited with the Government, and redeemable on demand in United States notes or coin. Such a system will secure to the people a safe currency of equal value in all parts of the country, receivable for all dues, and easily convertible into coin. Interest can thus be saved on so much of the public debt as can be conveniently maintained in permanent circulation, leaving to national banks the proper business of such corporations, of providing currency for the varying changes, the ebb and flow of trade.

Such also was the opinion of the late Chief-Justice Chase, as appears by the extract which I have read from his opinion in the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno.

I am very happy to be able also to support my views both as to the constitutionality and superior value of such a national currency by the opinions expressed with great force, and often reiterated, of the late Mr. Calhoun. He was, of course, the most eminent expounder of the doctrines of that school of constitutional lawyers and statesmen who believed that the Constitution of the United States ought to receive the strictest and most rigorous construction; and he had given to the subject of the currency the most thoughtful and considerate study of which he was capable. He believed it was the right and the duty of Congress to provide exclusively a national currency of paper money; and he believed that such a system was practically the best. The following extract from his speech on the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, delivered in the Senate September 19, 1837, (3 Calhoun's Works, 83,) although lengthy, is well worth being reproduced.

It is, then, my impression, that, in the present condition of the world, a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. The great desideratum is, to ascertain what description of paper has the requisite qualities of being free from fluctuation in value and liability to abuse in the greatest perfection. I have shown, I trust, that the bank-notes do not possess these requisites in a degree sufficiently high for this purpose. I go further. It appears to me, after bestowing the best reflection I can give the subject, that no convertible paper—that is, no paper whose credit rests upon a promise to pay—is suitable for currency. It is the form of credit proper in private transactions between man and man, but not for a standard of value, to perform exchanges generally, which constitute the appropriate functions of money or currency. The measures of safety in the two cases are wholly different. A promissory note, or convertible paper, is considered safe so long as the drawer has ample means to meet his engagements; and in passing from hand to hand regard is had only to his ability and willingness to pay. Very different is the case in currency. The aggregate value of the currency of a country necessarily bears a small proportion to the aggregate value of its property. This proportion is not well ascertained, and is probably subject to considerable variation in different countries and at different periods in the same country. It may be assumed conjecturally, in order to illustrate what I say, at 1 to 30.

Assuming this proportion to be correct, which probably is not very far from the truth, it follows that in a sound condition of the country where the currency is metallic, the aggregate value of the coin is not more than 1 in 30 of the aggregate value of the property. It also follows that an increase in the amount of the currency, by the addition of a paper circulation of no intrinsic value, but increases the nominal value of the aggregate property of the country in the same proportion that the increase bears to the whole amount of currency, so that, if the currency be doubled the nominal value of the property will also be doubled. Hence it is that when the paper currency of a country is in the shape of promissory notes there is a constant tendency to excess. We look for their safety to the ability of the drawer, (and so long as his means are ample to meet his engagements there is no distrust,) without reflecting that, considered as currency, it cannot safely exceed 1 in 30 in value compared to property; and the delusion is further increased by the constant increase in value of property with the increase of the notes in circulation, so as to maintain the same relative proportion. It follows that a government may safely contract a debt many times the amount of its aggregate circulation; but if it were to attempt to put its promissory notes in circulation in amounts equal to its debts an explosion in the currency would be inevitable. And hence, with other causes, the constant tendency to an excessive issue of bank-notes in prosperous times, when so large a portion of the community are anxious to obtain accommodation and are disappointed when negotiable paper is refused by the banks, not reflecting that it would not be safe to discount beyond the limits I have assigned for a safe circulation, however good the paper offered.

On what, then, ought a paper currency to rest? I would say, on demand and supply simply, which regulate the value of everything else—the constant demand which the Government has on the community for its necessary supplies. A medium, resting on this demand, which simply obligates the Government to receive it in all of its dues, to the exclusion of everything else, except gold and silver, and which shall be optional with those who have demands on Government to receive or not, would, it seems to me, be as stable in its value as those metals themselves, and be as little liable to abuse as the power of coining. It would contain within itself a self-regulating power. It could only be issued to those who had claims on the Government, and to those only with their consent, and, of course, only at or above par with gold and silver, which would be its habitual state; for, so far as the Government was concerned, it would be equal, in every respect, to gold and silver, and superior in many, particularly in regulating the distant exchanges of the country. Should, however, a demand for gold and silver from abroad, or other accidental causes, depress it temporarily as compared with the precious metals, it would then return to the Treasury, and as it could not be paid out during such depression, its gradual diminution in the market would soon restore it to an equality, when it would again flow out into the general circulation. Thus there would be a constant alternate flux and reflux into and from the Treasury, between it and the precious metals; but if at any time a permanent depression in its value be possible from any cause, the only effect would be to operate as a reduction of taxes on the community, and the only sufferer would be the Government itself. Against this its own interest would be a sufficient guarantee.

Nothing but experience can determine what amount and of what denominations might be safely issued; but it may be safely assumed that the country would absorb an amount greatly exceeding its annual income. Much of its exchanges, which amount to a vast sum, as well as its banking business, would revolve about it, and many millions would thus be kept in circulation beyond the demands of the Government. It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her. It was also made a legal tender, but which, of course, was not obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount, say between four and five hundred thousand dollars, remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum. I speak on the information of citizens of that State, on whom I can rely.

But whatever may be the amount that can be circulated I hold it clear that to that amount it would be as stable in value as gold and silver itself, provided the Government be bound to receive it exclusively with those metals in all its dues, and that it be left perfectly optional with those who have claims on the Government to receive it or not. It will also be a necessary condition that notes of too small a denomination should not be issued, so that the Treasury shall have ample means to meet all demands either in gold or silver or the bills of the Government, at the option of those who have claims on it. With these conditions, no further variation could take place between it and gold and silver than that which would be caused by the action of commerce. An unusual demand from abroad for the metals would of course raise them a little in their relative value and depress relatively the Government bills in the same proportion, which would cause them to flow into the Treasury and gold and silver to flow out, while on the contrary an increased demand for the bills in the domestic exchanges would have the reverse effect, causing, as I have stated, an alternate flux and reflux into the Treasury between the two, which would at all times keep their relative values either at or near par.

No one can doubt that the fact of the Government receiving and paying away bank-notes in all its fiscal transactions is one of the principal sources of their great circulation; and it was mainly on that account that the notes of the late Bank of the United States so freely circulated all over the Union. I would ask, then, why should the Government mingle its credit with that of private corporations? No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more stable and more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands, while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profits, to increase which they almost constantly extend their business to the most dangerous extremes? And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit blended with that of the banks, when the superior credit of the Government could be furnished separately, without discount, to the mutual advantage of the Government and the community? Why, let me ask, should the Government be exposed to such difficulties as the present, by mingling its credit with the banks, when it could be exempt from all such by using by itself its own safer credit? It is time the community, which has so deep an interest in a sound and cheap currency and the equality of the laws between one portion of the citizens of the country and another, should reflect seriously on these things; not for the purpose of oppressing any interest, but to correct gradually disorders of a dangerous character which have insensibly, in the long course of years, without being perceived by any one, crept into the state.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Ohio unless he is willing to be interrupted.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I am quite willing.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has quoted from the speech of Mr. Calhoun, made in 1837. I ask him if in that very speech, speaking of the very kind of Treasury notes which Mr. Calhoun believed the Government could issue, he did not expressly negative the idea that they could be made receivable by individuals in payment of their own dues, and whether he did not say that they should be only receivable in payment of dues to the Government? I ask if Mr. Calhoun did not express that negative there? I know it is in the speech.

Mr. MATTHEWS. He expressly negatives the idea that they should be a legal tender even as between the Government and the receiver, except with the receiver's consent.

Mr. HILL. Yes; not for private debts.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I do not read this extract as showing the authority of Mr. Calhoun for preferring a legal-tender Treasury note circulation, but as only demonstrating the opinion which he here expresses, which he reiterates often and again in subsequent discussions, that the best paper currency in the world is a Treasury-note circulation, to be received at the will of the party to whom it is offered by the Government, and redeemable in gold and silver.

Mr. HILL. And he went further and expressly negatived the idea that that Treasury note could by the Government be made a legal tender.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I have found no such phrase or passage anywhere in this or in any other speech of Mr. Calhoun, although the Senator from Georgia may be entirely right.

Mr. HILL. I will show it to the Senator. Moreover, I will ask the Senator from Ohio if Mr. Calhoun in that very speech does not make the necessities of the Government alone the basis for the issue of those Treasury notes, and therefore the extent to which they should be issued; and does he not speak of them as being a currency simply incidentally, and not directly?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I will answer, Mr. President, very emphatically, no.

Mr. HILL. Give me the book.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Certainly, I send the Senator the book. On the contrary his whole argument throughout the whole of that speech was to prove that Congress had the exclusive power to provide a national paper currency, and that that currency should be of Treasury notes issued by its direct authority and not by the banks, for the whole argument was a demonstration against the Bank of the United States and against the State banks both, as being depositories of any such power. The legal-tender feature played no part in the discussion, for nobody was proposing it, and he expressly excepts it, as between the Government and the party to whom it was offered; and he does base the limitation of the amount of the currency which could be kept safely in permanent circulation on the necessities of the Government itself, and demonstrating in the extract which I read that the amount which could thus be safely kept afloat and at par equal in value with gold and silver was about as 1 to 30 between the amount of the circulation and the aggregate value of the property of the country.

In my view, then, the resumption of specie payments as contemplated by law and the policy of the Government as expressed through the Secretary of the Treasury does not consist in retiring and canceling and abolishing the legal-tender notes as a national currency. On the contrary it consists in maintaining legal-tender notes as a part of the national currency, for the present, at least, making them and keeping them equivalent in value with coin, so as to be exchangeable for coin at par on the demand of the holder. If this be the true meaning of resumption of specie payments, as I think I have shown it to be, then I am in favor of it and will support all legislation necessary to make it effectual and permanent.

If, on the other hand, the resumption of specie payments shall be declared to consist in the redemption of legal-tender notes in the sense of retiring and canceling them, then I am opposed to it, and will vote for all legislation necessary to give that opposition effect. But I assume for the present that it is the general desire of the public, which will be carried into effect by any necessary enactments of Congress, to maintain the legal-tender notes as a part of the national currency. Those who believe that they ought ultimately to be withdrawn and replaced by the issues of banks, either national or State, will nevertheless, in my judgment, act wisely in not seeking that as a present and immediate result; as, on the other hand, those who are firmly persuaded that the whole area of possible circulation of paper money ought to be filled with National Treasury notes to the exclusion of the issues of all banks will also, in my judgment, act wisely in not seeking to give to their convictions present and immediate effect. The extremes on both sides ought to yield to a prudent consideration of our present financial situation. In whatever direction we move we ought to take but one step at a time; and if we can take that step now together without committing either party to any ultimate direction hostile to its views of public utility, that step ought to be taken and none other considered until its effect has been determined by experience. The question whether we should ultimately abolish legal-tenders or ultimately abolish national banks can be postponed. There is no necessity for its present decision, and there is therefore no reason for its present consideration. What we do need to settle is that our existing currency shall be made as good, and kept as good, as it can be, by making it conform in a stable, permanent way with that standard of value which measures all things, both in our domestic and in our foreign exchanges. The great point is to have the relation between coin values and values expressed in our own currency established and fixed. It does not make so much difference what the relation is—whether it is one represented by a par of exchange or a premium and discount—as that whatever arrangement may be determined upon shall remain from day to day and month to month and year to year, so that men who have in the present to make their future shall be able to calculate with confidence that the elements of their problem shall not change under their hands while they are endeavoring to solve it. The best relation is that of equality. It is one from which the tendency to vary is soonest discovered, and by which any actual variance is the most easily corrected. It fixes our ventures rocking on restless waves as the anchor fixes the ship. It is the ballast which steadies every vessel in the course of trade; it is the standard most easily recognized by the general public and most effectually secures the inexperienced and uninstructed against fraud and chicane. It enables every one to mark the rise of the tide, and so most accurately to watch and guard against all those fluctuations which necessarily beget uncertainty in business and which from time to time seem to culminate in speculation and disaster. The desirable thing, therefore, is to maintain the national currency as steadily as the needle to the pole at an equality with coin. This can only be done by maintaining the law which makes it obligatory on the Treasury to exchange its notes at par for coin on demand. Take away that obligation and there is no certainty that the equivalency will remain. Give in addition to it the means to make the obligation good, not only requiring the Treasury to exchange its notes for coin at par on demand, but enabling it to do so, and the problem is solved. The Government then discharges its duty. That it has the means to do it no one doubts.

Two objections, however, are urged against the continuance in force of the resumption act by those who urge its repeal.

One is that the execution of the law will result in further depressions of the value of property and a continued prostration of industry by means of a further contraction of the greenback circulation, which will involve the whole business interests of the country in disaster and ruin.

The other objection is that it is impossible to execute the law, or, rather, to continue its execution permanently; that the country is not in a condition and the Treasury cannot be placed in a condition permanently to continue resumption of specie payments. It is said that the volume of the currency to be redeemed and made convertible into coin ought not to be contracted, and cannot be without irreparable injury to public and private interests, and yet that it is so large that it cannot be made and kept equivalent in value to coin and interchangeable with it on demand.

In respect to the first objection, will the execution of the resumption law of 1875 on the 1st of January, 1879, as contemplated by the exchange on the part of the Treasury of coin for Treasury notes on demand of the holder, have any disastrous effect upon any public or private interest?

The present difference of value nominally in the market, as quoted in the public press, between gold coin and greenbacks is about the half of 1 per cent. What it will be on the 1st of January next of course no one can certainly tell in advance. The causes which have operated to overcome the premium on gold have almost extinguished it now. They are still in active force, and their influence is not likely to be diminished in the course of the next six months.

Whatever they may be, whether the hoarding of greenbacks and national-bank notes in anticipation of resumption, or whether it be more general causes, growing out of our international exchanges and the favorable balance of trade which continues to bring coin to our coffers in greater supply than the demand and thus to diminish its comparative value, there is every reason to suppose that they will continue actively to influence the course of events for some time yet to come. If so, the point of equality and par of exchange between greenbacks and coin will have been attained at or before the time when by law the Treasury will be required to make the actual exchange on demand. And there is reason, therefore, to believe that when the time arrives all motive for the demand will cease and with it the demand itself. So that coin being no more useful than paper and being less convenient, there will be no reason why anybody will wish to exchange paper for coin. It makes nothing in this argument to censure the past. If there has been any contraction of the currency, and that contraction has wrought disaster to individuals in the effort of the country to attain specie payments, the evil is done and irremediable. The comfort is that it is over and cannot be repeated; for when contraction has come to its limit contraction will cease, and with it all the evils of contraction.

In point of law there has been no contraction. The authorized currency of the country is to-day by law as great as it ever was. In point of fact currency has been as abundant. The rate of interest has been lower. Holders of currency have been anxious to part with it. The difficulty has been in obtaining borrowers who were willing to run the risks of its profitable use. There has been stagnation of business, and is still. The evils under which the country is suffering may be summed up in two words: unemployed capital. Unemployed capital means unemployed labor, and that implies all that is evil in our industrial condition. Why capital is not willing to employ labor and thus employ itself is a deep question. There are many opinions. Some say, want of confidence in the future; but why should there be want of confidence? Others say, overproduction; but overproduction means in its absolute sense a multiplication of the necessaries and comforts of life beyond the ability of those who need them to consume; while the difficulty is that people are not getting comforts and necessaries of life with the ease and in the quantity which they desire. Others say it is not overproduction but it is underconsumption; but that is the same thing. Men are as ready to consume, if they could obtain what they need, as they ever were, and need it quite as much. Others say that it is loss of capital wasted and consumed in war and in unproductive and unremunerative enterprises. It is undoubtedly true that the whole of our national debt, including the whole of our legal-tender circulation, represents an amount of actual property which has disappeared from active and useful existence, which, if it now existed in the form in which it might and would, would furnish that much of a fund whereby labor could be employed and maintained and paid, invested in useful and successful industries. It is also certain that the rise of prices of every description of property, including the wages of labor, attributed and attributable to the inflation of irredeemable paper circulation created during the war, inflamed the imaginations of men in respect to the future, so that they were led to invest not only past earnings but expectations of future profit and loans based on those expectations in many enterprises, such, for instance, as the construction of railroads which were unremunerative and swallowed up in irretrievable loss the capital invested in them.

The result of all these causes, whatever they may be, and however they may have operated, has been the creation of enormous debt based upon an expectation of enormous profits. The profits have disappeared; the value of the property out of which they were to come has vanished; the debt alone remains magnified relatively by the diminution of the means of payment. Hence comes insolvency; hence comes distress; hence comes the stoppage first of this mill, then of that factory, now of a mine, and again of a trade; and such a change in the expectations of men in regard to the future that they have been unwilling to venture further. Every one has looked forward, not with hope but with doubt; at least all have economized in order to meet the expected storm; and so capital has gradually withdrawn itself from every active employment for fear of loss until it has become more profitable for it to be idle than to be employed.

No doubt the gradual tendency toward specie values upon the expectation of the resumption of specie payments has tended, with the other causes to which I have referred, to appreciate the value of the currency and to depreciate the value of all other property. Whatever evil there is, we have suffered; whatever good, we are about to attain. Certainly it would be not wisdom but folly to retrace our steps in order merely that we might undergo a similar fatal experience. We have now passed far beyond the middle of the stream, borne for a time upon its swift and deep current toward a threatened destruction. At last our feet feel the firm ground. Shall we in another step attain the dry and safe shore, or plunge back again in order again to encounter the dangers we have just escaped?

The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] in his speech on this subject in the Senate, on the 2d instant, declared that to attain the resumption of specie payments—

> The prosperity of the country has been trodden into the dust and battered out of all shape and recognition. Within the last three months, as I have shown, the pursuit of this policy has rendered impossible the payment of nearly a hundred millions of debts. The poverty, the desolation, the indescribable private sorrows of families which these failures have cost can never be expiated; nor will the policy which caused them, with its track of ruined lives, ever be forgotten or forgiven by the American people.

Now, the resumption of specie payments to which that Senator alludes, so far as it has taken effect as a policy, has been, not the destruction of the greenback circulation, but simply such a series of steps as have had the effect of bringing it nearly to par with coin. Accordingly he says, further on in his speech, as follows:

> We are met, however, at this time by those who oppose the repeal of the resumption act with the fact that our paper circulation is quoted in the money markets at only a small fraction below par in gold. This is held up to us as practical resumption. The money power, turning its back upon the ruin it has wrought, and ignoring the wide-spread suffering it has inflicted, now calls out exultingly that it has at last reached the destination for which it has caused so many millions to water their bread with tears. It is true that the legal-tender United States note, known as the greenback dollar, partly by reason of its contraction in amount, and far more by reason of the confidence which the people have in it as money, has forced itself, in the face of calumny and fixed hostility on the part of the Government, to a substantial equality with gold. This is not the result of any financial statesmanship. It has taken place in spite of a policy directly adverse to it. It is simply the result of a public opinion upholding a currency which this Government has assailed with discredit from the hour of its creation. * * * What, then, has brought a paper currency for which there is now practically no specie basis up to par with specie? I can answer. It is because public opinion has forced this Government, step by step, to treat its own currency with respect, with fairness, and with honor. It is owing to that public sentiment which has been for years past urging, and at last with the promise of success, that the Government shall receive the money it has authorized to circulate among the people for all its own debts, dues, and obligations, except in the face of an express stipulation to the contrary.

Sir, I do not, I confess, quite understand how the Government has assailed its currency with discredit from the hour of its creation, and at the same time has been forced by public opinion to treat that currency "with respect, with fairness, and with honor." There certainly has been no change in the law by which the Government as yet has treated the currency differently at this time from what it has done from the beginning. It is my opinion that a great financial mistake was made when, by the act of March 3, 1863, the holders of United States notes were deprived, after the 1st of July of that year, of the right originally attached to the notes when issued of converting them into 6 per cent. bonds of the United States, which was an act of discredit tending greatly to the depreciation of that currency; and I also think that if, as might have been, the United States notes had been kept at par with coin they ought to have been made always receivable in payment of all public dues, including duties on imports.

But the point is this: it is agreed on all hands that the maintenance of the value of the legal-tender currency at par with coin is a desirable thing. Now, whatever evil has been wrought by a pursuit of the policy toward specie payments has been wrought in bringing about that very state of things, and it matters but little whether the eulogy is pronounced upon the public sentiment which it is said has brought about that result or the course of the Government which has been influenced by that public sentiment. If the mere passage of the resumption act and continuing it in force up to this time has had the effect to bring the legal-tender notes to the specie standard, then its tendency has been good, and it ought not to be repealed. And certainly when that effect has been produced in anticipation merely of its maintenance by the means authorized to be employed by the resumption act, surely it would be the height of folly to repeal that act in view of that probable result.

The Senator from Indiana also took occasion, in the speech to which I have referred, to say that—

> It will not be forgotten by the American people that in June, 1876, at the city of Saint Louis, the democratic party in national convention, with authorized delegates from every State and congressional district in the Union, declared in favor of the repeal of this odious and crushing measure.

If this measure, the resumption act, be characterized as "odious and crushing," it must be so only because it has had the tendency to appreciate the value of the legal-tender currency toward par with coin; and yet that is the very result which the Senator has stated to have already arrived, because public opinion had forced the Government step by step to treat its own currency "with respect, with fairness and with honor." But, inasmuch as the memory of the declaration of the democratic party in its national convention at Saint Louis has been revived, it may be well also to revive the memory of the character of that declaration and the ground on which the repeal of the resumption clause of the act of 1875 was demanded. That declaration is as follows:

> We denounce the failure for all these eleven years of peace to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes, which are a changing standard of value in the hands of the people and the non-payment of which is a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation.
> We denounce the financial imbecility and immorality of that party which, during eleven years of peace, has made no advance toward resumption, no preparation for resumption, but instead has obstructed resumption by wasting our resources and exhausting all our surplus income and, while annually professing to intend a speedy return to specie payments, has annually enacted fresh hinderances thereto. As such hinderance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875, and we here demand its repeal.

How the resumption clause of the act of 1875 could operate as a "hinderance" to resumption must be left to be discovered by those who are wiser than I. But what is certain is that the Senator from Indiana has denounced the resumption clause of the act of 1875 and demanded its repeal, not because it was a "hinderance" to resumption, but because in his opinion the very policy of resumption itself was "odious and crushing."

It seems a little hard that the policy of resumption, now so near success, should be denounced in the name of the democratic party when that party itself has denounced the party responsible for the policy of resumption, because it had made no advance toward resumption and no preparation for resumption, but had continually obstructed resumption.

I presume, Mr. President, that Mr. Tilden will be accepted as an authority in expounding the democratic platform of 1876. In his letter of acceptance he scouts the idea now so much dwelt upon, that the process of resumption could be the cause of business distress. He says:

> A vague idea of distress is therefore often associated with the process of resumption. But the conditions which caused distress in those former instances do not now exist. The Government has only to make good its own promises, and the banks can take care of themselves without distressing anybody. The Government is therefore the sole delinquent.
> How shall the Government make these notes at all times as good as specie? It has to provide, in reference to the mass which would be kept in use by the wants of business, a central reservoir of coin, adequate to the adjustment of the temporary fluctuations of international balances, and as a guarantee against transient drains artificially created by panic or by speculation. It has also to provide for the payment in coin of such fractional currency as may be presented for redemption, and such inconsiderable portions of the legal-tenders as individuals may from time to time desire to convert for special use or in order to lay by in coin their little stores of money.
> To make the coin now in the Treasury available for the objects of this reserve, to gradually strengthen and enlarge that reserve, and to provide for such other exceptional demands for coin as may arise, does not seem to me a work of difficulty. If wisely planned and discreetly pursued, it ought not to cost any sacrifice to the business of the country. It should tend, on the contrary, to a revival of hope and confidence.

And that he did not fear any evil consequence as the result of a necessary contraction in the legal-tender circulation is evident by what he further says:

> With respect to whatever surplus of legal-tenders the wants of business may fail to keep in use, and which, in order to save interest, will be returned for redemption, they can either be paid or they can be funded. Whether they continue as currency or be absorbed into the vast mass of securities held as investments is merely a question of the rate of interest they draw. Even if they were to remain in their present form and the Government were to agree to pay on them a rate of interest making them desirable as investments they would cease to circulate and take their place with Government, State, municipal, and other corporate and private bonds of which thousands of millions exist among us.

So again he says:

> The proper time for resumption is the time when wise preparations shall have ripened into a perfect ability to accomplish the object with a certainty and ease that will inspire confidence and encourage the reviving of business. The earliest time in which such a result can be brought about is the best.

There are two facts, which unfortunately are too notorious to admit of denial, which are inconsistent with the theory that the present depression of business and consequent distress in this country are attributable solely to the prospective resumption of specie payments, and for which the advocates of that theory have thus far been totally unable to account.

The first of these is that the collapse, of which our present condition is but a continuance, occurred in September, 1873, beginning with the sudden failure of Jay Cooke & Co. and the suspension of their enterprises in connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad. At that time, and up to that time, everything had been going on in the accustomed way, without suspicion on the part of the general public of any impending disaster. The panic created by that suspension was simply a revelation to the public of the hollowness of the existing condition of business. It was followed by all the evil things which we have seen; and our present condition is simply a continuation of that order of things which was introduced by that apparent disaster. It is quite certain that the origin of our existing troubles is not due to the passage of the resumption act of 1875, for at that time it was not even contemplated, and it could hardly be supposed to have acted before it began to exist. It is possible that if specific preparation for resumption under that act had begun, the expectation of the change which was ordained to take place on the 1st of January, 1879, has had a tendency to prolong the suspense, and it is not impossible that it would have been better to have established in the act of 1875, instead of a fixed and arbitrary date when resumption should take place, the attainment of the conditions of successful resumption as the only time when resumption should begin.

Outside of that cause of aggravation the real causes of the prostration of business and the destruction of values in this country must be looked for and found in other sources. This is evident, too, by means of the other fact to which I have alluded as not being accounted for by the opposing theory. That fact is that our business depression and trouble is not ours alone; it is not peculiar to us. The industrial system of England is to-day and has been for five years past as thoroughly disorganized and exhibiting as many distressing symptoms as our own. No part of Europe has altogether escaped. Germany, Austria, and Italy certainly share the same condition. France alone seems to show a contrast; but in France we have the example of a country which, during the period of a war and during the existence of an inconvertible paper currency, suddenly and largely increased in amount to meet the exigencies of war, has nevertheless continuously from the beginning commenced and kept in existence the necessary process for keeping itself in a state of readiness for specie resumption by accumulating from day to day in the vaults of the Bank of France enormous amounts of coin. The legal-tender quality of its paper was relied upon merely for the purpose of preventing the flow outward of its coin. The amount of reserve kept on hand in readiness for resumption whenever the public authorities deemed that resumption could be successfully maintained when once begun has been kept so large in proportion to the whole amount of paper circulation that the discount on the notes of the bank at no time exceeded 2½ per cent., and most of the time was far below that. So that the French example is the example of a country and government which began the work of preparing for resumption the moment specie payments were suspended.

Another single fact not usually remembered and taken into account is that in this country the greatest period of contraction of our paper money took place between the years 1866 and 1869–70. Counting what were known as 7.30 notes and compound-interest notes as adding to the volume of currency during that period, it will be found that in 1866 there were outstanding of bank-notes and unfunded Government debt circulating as money the enormous amount of $1,803,702,726, which in 1870 had been reduced to $740,039,179; since which the contraction has been comparatively insignificant.

Now, according to the theory that contraction is the cause of our adversity, our business troubles ought to have been developed in the period of the greatest contraction; whereas, on the other hand, in point of fact this very period was regarded as the period of unexampled prosperity. The increase of railroad mileage was greater each year during the whole of that period. In 1866 there was an increase of about 3 per cent. on the mileage of 1865; and the ratio of increase was greater each year afterward until 1871, when there was an increase of over 12 per cent. on the mileage of 1870. Prices in currency of nearly all commodities advanced largely during the first half of that period, and were maintained during the latter half, notwithstanding a decline in the average annual price of gold from 140 in 1866 to 123 in 1870.

It is therefore plain either that this great contraction of the currency from 1866 to 1870 had no effect upon values and business or else that its effect was neutralized and overcome by some more general and potent cause.

I conclude, therefore, Mr. President, upon this point that no good is to be expected from the unconditional repeal of the resumption act. Its repeal without a substitute would be simply to reintroduce into our business system an element of uncertainty, which is the bane and curse of all thrift and success, and to postpone the day for the revival of that confidence and hope without which we cannot expect the return of prosperity. This conclusion of course is based upon what I have already said as to the sense which is to be put upon resumption, that it does not mean the retirement and cancellation of the notes of the United States, but it means the maintenance of the legal-tender note, continued equal in value and exchangeable on demand with coin, as the basis of our paper-money system, supported in part in its circulation and value by the credit which its uses as a legal tender give it and in part by a daily ability on the part of the Treasury to redeem as much as may be presented for that purpose in par in coin.

What we need, therefore, is not the repeal of the resumption act. We need to supplement it and perfect it by providing means not only for beginning resumption but permanently maintaining it.

The first step, of course, in any such scheme is to determine by law and fix the maximum amount of the legal-tender currency for which the Government shall be bound to provide redemption. Of course this amount to be fixed by law must be to a certain extent an arbitrary sum. No one can tell with scientific certainty the amount of such currency which either the Government can always be able to redeem or which will always be needed by the people. We can approximate it; and in doing so can avoid any palpable errors by regarding limits already fixed by our own experience. The present maximum established by law is $400,000,000. The intended maximum foreshadowed in the resumption act of 1875 was $300,000,000. We cannot be far out of the way if we fix our maximum at $350,000,000; as in case we find it to be too large we can easily diminish the amount of bank circulation by appropriate legislation if necessary. And it is to be remembered, moreover, that the fixing by law of the possible maximum does not necessarily determine the amount actually in circulation at any given time. Amounts not needed, once in the Treasury, will remain there, and not constitute a part of the circulation until issued again, as the exigencies and interests of the public service may require. The paper money of the Government, of course, is only issued for equivalent consideration and as the operations of the Government make its issue necessary, and if any redundancy should be in the hands of the public, so that the excess in circulation beyond the demands of business should be felt in even a slight depreciation of value, it would be immediately returned by the holders into the Treasury in exchange for coin which not being wasted at home would find a market abroad; and thus the equilibrium would be restored and preserved.

The next step is to provide what Mr. Tilden, in his letter of acceptance calls a "reservoir" of specie as a redemption fund—a reserve in the hands of the Government to meet occasional demands either for the settlement of international balances, or the restoration of the equivalency in value between paper and coin at home.

The Secretary of the Treasury, I believe, has more than once expressed the opinion that a coin-reserve fund for purposes of redemption of $100,000,000 would be sufficient to maintain a circulation of $300,000,000 of Government paper. Under ordinary circumstances it seems to me this would be sufficient, although it is not so great a proportion as in more recent times upon banking principles has been deemed sufficient by practical men to maintain the circulation of bank paper; but there is a manifest difference between bank paper and the legal-tender notes of the Government. The legal-tender quality—the use of the paper in the operations of the Government—in payment of taxes, and in the disbursement of revenues, and in the funding operations of the Government, not only give to it the ultimate basis of the solvency of the Government for its credit as a circulating medium but give it active employment, create a demand for its use which tends to buoy it up, without reference to its convertibility. That demand alone, without reference to its capacity of being convertible into coin, would maintain its equivalency in value with coin provided the amount issued is kept strictly within the limit of that demand. The operation of this principle is daily observed in the currency of our subsidiary coin. They are mere tokens, not intrinsically worth what they are nominally received for, but kept afloat at their nominal rather than their real value for the reason that they supply a demand not otherwise capable of being satisfied. As long as they are kept within the limit of that demand they will always be rated at their nominal value without regard to their intrinsic worth.

The same principle will operate upon that portion of the whole volume of United States notes, for which there is a constant and active demand for use in the dealings between the people and the Government and between the people themselves.

While, therefore, the ratio of 3 of paper for 1 of coin might not be considered safe in maintaining the credit and circulation of mere bank paper resting on private credit, it is safe, I think, to assume that it would be ample for maintaining the par of exchange between a government paper and coin.

The next step in any such scheme is to provide the means not only for maintaining actual redemption but to provide against the possibility of a necessary suspension of specie payments. Unless there is a dollar in coin for every dollar of outstanding paper money, there is, of course, always a possibility that the whole amount of outstanding paper notes may be presented at the same instant for redemption. That, of course, implies and results in suspension. That result is brought about in various ways, but is most usually the result of mere mental apprehension and panic—the same state of mind which upon a sudden alarm attacks and seizes upon the mass of people in a church or a theater when an alarm of fire is suddenly proclaimed. Every one rushes he knows not why and he knows not whither, impelled by some impulse caught from his neighbor. He does not stop to think or to reason, and thus often the principal cause of the very disaster apprehended is the apprehension which has begotten it.

In England, supposed to have the soundest and most stable financial system in the world, the Bank of England, by law, is authorized to issue its notes, payable on demand, to circulate as money, with the quality of legal tender, except between the bank itself and its customers, in excess of actual coin on deposit, and any reserves to the extent of about £14,000,000. Of course if at any moment, its coin having been exhausted in the redemption of the notes which it actually represents, the demand should be made for the payment of any portion of this excess the bank would be compelled necessarily to suspend specie payments. Under the operation of its system the bank guards against the effect of drains of its specie and the possibility of such extraordinary demands usually by increasing the rate of its interest upon loans, and thereby contracting its circulation and diminishing the demand for money by making it harder to get; but on two or three occasions, when a rapid diminution of its coin reserves took place, tending to create alarm and panic, the bank has applied for and received dispensations by orders in council from the government, relieving it from the obligation of specie payments, so that it could freely issue its notes to meet the demand without being called upon to make them good in coin. In each of these cases the actual or apprehended panic has been either prevented or allayed by the facility with which those who sought were able to obtain the money which they thought they could not get and therefore asked for.

The community relied upon the stability of the Government itself as the foundation of the credit of the paper money, without fear of loss, and thus all apprehensions have been quieted and all the consequences of financial revolution prevented.

A similar provision can be usefully incorporated into our own scheme. Its necessity was anticipated in the measure which I shall have the honor to propose, and is approved expressly by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report. He says:

In establishing a system of paper money designed to be permanent, it must be remembered that heretofore no expedient has been devised, either in this or other countries, that in times of panic or adverse trade has prevented the drain and exhaustion of coin reserves, however large or carefully guarded. Every such system must provide for a suspension of specie payment. Laws may forbid or ignore such a contingency, but it will come; and when it comes it cannot be resisted, but should be acknowledged and declared, to prevent unnecessary sacrifice and ruin. In our free Government the power to make this declaration will not be willingly intrusted to individuals, but should be determined by events and conditions known to all. It is far better to fix the maximum of legal-tender notes at $300,000,000, supported by a minimum reserve of $100,000,000 of coin, only to be used for the redemption of notes not to be reissued until the reserve is restored. A demand for coin to exhaust such a reserve may not occur, but if events force it, its existence would be known and could be declared, and would justify a temporary suspension of specie payments. Some such expedient could no doubt be provided by Congress for an exceptional emergency. In other times the general confidence in these notes would maintain them at par in coin and justify their use as reserves of banks and for the redemption of bank-notes.

Certainly we must all agree that suspension of specie payment on the part of the Government, being possible, ought to be provided against, and that, inasmuch as when the conditions making them necessary occur the result cannot be averted, it is much better to anticipate them by law than to permit them to come without law. A suspension of specie payments by the Treasury in pursuance of provisions of law, intended and effective to avert the evil consequences of suspension and making ample provisions for restoring specie payments, is much better than to have the Treasury go into a state of involuntary and illegal bankruptcy. If we suspend we should suspend by law, and not against law, and suspend under such circumstances as to show a present intention according to law to resume at the earliest practicable moment.

This feature of the plan which legalizes the suspension of specie payments after resumption, when the specie reserve has been diminished below the point of safety, strongly commends it on another ground. It furnishes the Treasury an effectual security against all attacks from speculators in coin. No scheme for the manipulation of the coin market could carry its point in the face of the certain ability of the Treasury to escape from its operations by the exercise of its right of suspension.

Of course, in anticipation of periods of suspension, it is necessary to provide immediate means for the restoration to the Treasury of its supply of coin and its ability to resume; and it is a mere matter of justice to the holder of the Treasury note, whose demand for coin has been refused, to give him its value in an investment. It will serve and secure both these ends to provide in such a contingency that the holder of the notes shall be entitled, instead of coin, to demand and receive an interest-bearing bond of the Government, and to provide that the Treasury notes thus redeemed shall not be reissued into the ordinary channels of circulation except in the reduction of the public debt or in the purchase of coin for that purpose. In this way both contraction and inflation are avoided, and the public debt, which is increased temporarily to redeem the notes, is diminished again by the use of the very notes redeemed.

In addition to the security of the coin reserve as a means of redemption, the equivalency of the currency in value to the par of coin must be maintained by multiplying to its greatest extent the use of the Treasury notes. To this end power should be given, as it often has been asked, to the Secretary of the Treasury to utilize the common circulation in the process of refunding the public debt. He should have authority to receive payment of all subscriptions to the new bonds to be issued under the refunding act of 1870 at their coin value in Treasury notes, and use the same Treasury notes thus received in redeeming the 5.20 bonds to be retired or in the purchase of coin for that purpose. This conversion would furnish active employment for a considerable portion of the circulation and create for it an additional demand which would add something to its value.

A more important use, however, than that can properly and ought as a matter of policy to be added to the legal-tender circulation, and that is to make it receivable in payment of all dues and debts, both public and private, with the exception of the interest and principal of the public debt. This would make it receivable in payment of duties on imported goods. In that way a new value would be added to it as currency and the demand for coin in the same degree lessened and the approximation in value between the two brought to the point of identity.

It may be supposed, and, indeed, has been alleged, that such a change in the existing law would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government toward the public creditor. This charge is based upon the supposed pledge contained in the sinking-fund act of February 25, 1862. The terms of that act are:

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

How far the terms of this statute may or ought to be regarded as a pledge of the public faith to the maintenance of the particular fund in the particular manner prescribed is a question that may admit of debate. Certainly as long as the United States Government, in point of fact effectually, according to the terms of their contract and obligations, pay the principal and interest of the public debt, it is difficult to see or understand how it can be bound to any particular mode which it has prescribed to itself for executing its obligations, unless that mode has been made a part of the obligation itself. Here nothing of that sort has occurred. The supposed pledge of faith is simply a declaration by statute of the intention and policy of the Government, to last as long as the Government chooses to maintain it, subject to alteration to suit its own convenience, as long as it leaves unimpaired the force of its own obligations and performs with punctuality the actual duties which it has undertaken.

But, waiving that question, it is apparent, from the face of the statute referred to and a part of the financial history of the country at the time, that the duties on imported goods at and after the time of the passage of the act were payable not only in coin but in Treasury notes, known at that time as demand-notes, because they were payable on demand at the Treasury in coin, and were redeemed as often as presented; and although the language of the act of February 25, 1862, only refers to those theretofore issued and then by law receivable in payment of public dues, it certainly is not contrary to the spirit and intent of that act to receive in payment of duties on imported goods any United States notes payable in coin on demand as long as those notes in point of fact are so paid on demand. The substance of the obligation to the public creditor is to pay principal and interest in coin, and the Government collects duties in coin only in order that the substance of that obligation may be performed. Now, if Treasury notes are equal in value to coin and the Treasury is able to exchange coin for them on demand, the substance of the obligation is performed whether they or the coin which they represent are received in payment of duties. So that it cannot justly be charged that the Government fails in its duty to any creditor by authorizing the receipt, in payment of duties on imported goods, of its own notes as long as it makes and keeps those notes equal in value to coin.

Of course during any period of suspension when the Government is unable to effect on demand the promised exchange of coin for notes and thus the notes are no longer a legal equivalent for coin, the situation is changed. It can then no longer with propriety accept its notes in payment of duties out of regard to its own policy, for it must necessarily rely, in part at least, upon the receipt of coin in payment of duties to replenish the Treasury redemption fund and so restore the lost equilibrium between its paper and coin. Hence it is essential, in any plan permanently to establish the system of specie payments upon the theory of maintaining the legal-tender circulation at par with coin, to make provision for that supply of coin without which this equivalency cannot be maintained.

It is also essential to any such scheme of law that it should be automatic, self-executing, and self-regulating. It should leave the least possible to personal or official discretion. It should foresee all the critical contingencies which constitute elements in its working, and provide for such instrumentalities and methods as shall give effect to the scheme without subjecting its operations to the control of individual or personal interest, caprice, or judgment. For this reason the maximum circulation should be fixed by the law.

The least amount of the coin reserve to be acquired and maintained, and the exact point fixed below which if it fall not only the right of the Secretary to carry on the actual process of resumption, but the very authority to do so should be taken away, and during that period the exact rights and duties both of the holders of the notes and officer of the Government should be accurately and correspondingly defined, and the means provided by which the vacuum in the Treasury, which from any cause has been created should be again supplied with that which is necessary to set again in motion the regular and normal operations of the process.

Mr. President, the plan which I have just described is embodied in the provisions of the bill which I had the honor to introduce on the 8th day of November last and which I have renewed as a proposition on the 10th of last April as an amendment by way of a substitute for the House bill under consideration.

Its first section defines the resumption of specie payments, as I have defined it, by authorizing the reissue of legal-tender notes returned to the Treasury or redeemed in coin from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service may require; but so that the amount at any time outstanding and authorized to be issued shall not exceed the sum of $350,000,000; expressly forbidding any reduction of this authorized currency below that sum.

The second section requires that the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of redeeming such notes, shall acquire and maintain a reserve fund in coin not less in amount than $100,000,000, to be provided and maintained by the use of surplus revenues and the proceeds of the sale of bonds as authorized by the resumption act, and provides, in order to obviate any objection that may justly exist at the fixing of an arbitrary date for beginning resumption, that the obligation of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem notes in coin shall not begin until said reserve fund has accumulated to the sum of $100,000,000; and to that extent it repeals the date fixed for resumption in the resumption act of 1875.

The third section provides that, whenever the coin-reserve fund shall have been reduced to the sum of $50,000,000, the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes thereafter presented for redemption shall be suspended until the reserve fund shall have been restored to the sum of $100,000,000, but that during every such period of suspension the holders of legal-tender notes, presenting them for redemption, shall have the right, instead of coin, to demand and receive in exchange therefor an equal amount at par of bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, of the description and quality and with the like privileges and exemptions of such as are described in the refunding act of 1870, and declares that no legal-tender notes thus redeemed by the issue of these bonds shall be reissued until said reserve-coin fund shall have been restored to the sum of $100,000,000, except for the purpose of purchasing 5.20 bonds or coin with which to redeem them.

The fourth section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to receive, in payment of any of the bonds of the United States which he may sell under the authority of the refunding act of 1870, the legal-tender notes of the United States in lieu of coin, but at not less than the par value of the bonds in coin, less the allowance made by the refunding act itself of one-half of 1 per cent. for the expense of preparing and disposing of the bonds; and also provides that he shall use such legal-tender notes so received in payment of bonds in the purchase of 5.20 bonds at a price not exceeding their par value in coin or in purchasing coin for the redemption of such bonds.

The fifth section defines the legal-tender quality of the Treasury notes and extends it so as to embrace the payment of all debts and dues, public and private, within the United States, except in payment of the principal and interest of the public debt; with a proviso, however, that during any period when, in pursuance of the act, the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes in coin shall be suspended such notes shall not be receivable in payment of duties on imports.

This measure I now offer to the consideration of the Senate as a substitute for the proposition to unconditionally repeal the resumption act, and in lieu also of the proposition reported by way of substitute for that measure by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and of the House bill since received providing simply for the reissue of Treasury notes after redemption.

The amendment which I propose covers substantially the ground intended to be occupied by the report of the Finance Committee and the House bill just referred to, but contains provisions, already sufficiently explained, without which I think any scheme of resumption is likely to prove defective.

I ask for this proposition the considerate attention of Senators, both of those who favor the unconditional repeal of the resumption act as well as all those who think the policy of resumption ought to be carried into successful execution. It furnishes, in my judgment, ground upon which both can stand without either yielding its principles. On the one hand, those who believe that ultimately the legal-tender notes ought to be withdrawn can, I think, with manifest propriety say that it must not be done by way of revolution; if done at all it ought to be done only in the most gradual way, and as public sentiment should be satisfied with the reasons which justify its discontinuance. The bill, if passed into a law, commits no one to the perpetual maintenance of the legal-tender quality and circulating power of the Treasury note. It maintains them only because now is not the proper time to dispense with them.

On the other hand, those who believe that the legal-tender power and circulation of the Treasury notes ought to be perpetuated, not only as a basis of our system of money, but to the exclusion of all other descriptions of paper money, may well accept the provisions of this bill, at least as a step which does not commit them against future legislation in the direction of their policy. The whole question of the functions and existence in the future of the national or State-bank system of currency is untouched by its provisions. The bill attempts to establish no ultimate and final system of national currency. It regards the situation in which we are. It builds upon what we have. It seeks to amend where there is manifest defect, and to perfect what is capable of being made better. It attempts to overthrow and destroy nothing. It simply aims to carry out the very promise of the present system, to develop it to the best point attainable by a single step. Beyond that it does not seek to go. Is it not wise to legislate in this spirit? Is it not better to make haste slowly?

In conclusion, Mr. President, after the most anxious and deliberate consideration of this question of which I am capable, I submit the proposition to the Senate as my contribution to the settlement of a question of such grave importance to the public welfare.

I move, Mr. President, the adoption of the substitute formally as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Finance, if that be in order. I should like to have the proposition reported for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That when any United States legal-tender notes are returned to the Treasury, or shall have been redeemed in coin, in pursuance of the act to which this is supplementary, they shall be reissued, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service may require, or others with like legal-tender quality and of equal amounts issued in lieu thereof, but so that the amount of said legal-tender notes at any time outstanding and authorized to be issued shall not exceed the sum of $350,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall not make any reduction of the authorized currency by retiring and canceling United States notes below said sum.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of redeeming said legal-tender notes from time to time, as prescribed by law, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to acquire and maintain in the Treasury a reserve fund in coin, not less in amount than $100,000,000, to be provided and maintained by the use of surplus revenues and the proceeds of the sales of bonds as authorized by said act "to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, to which this is supplementary: Provided, That the obligation of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem said legal-tender notes in coin shall not begin until said reserve fund in coin has accumulated in the Treasury to the said sum of $100,000,000, anything in the act to which this is supplementary to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. That whenever said coin-reserve fund shall be reduced to the sum of $50,000,000 the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem any legal-tender notes thereafter presented for redemption shall be suspended until the said reserve fund shall have been restored to the said sum of $100,000,000; but during every such period of suspension the holders of any such legal-tender notes presenting them for redemption shall have the right, instead of coin, to demand and receive in exchange therefor, in sums of not less than $50 and any multiples thereof, an equal amount at par of bonds of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, of the description and quality and with the like privileges and exemptions of such as are described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and no legal-tender notes thus redeemed shall be reissued, nor others in lieu thereof, until said reserve-coin fund shall have been restored to said sum of $100,000,000, except for the purchase of bonds or coin, as specified in the fourth section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, on and after the passage of this act, is authorized to receive, in payment of any of the bonds of the United States which he may sell under the authority of the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," the legal-tender notes of the United States in lieu of coin, but at not less than the par value of said bonds in coin, less an allowance of a sum not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent. of the said bonds, appropriated to pay the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the same, and shall use said legal-tender notes so received, or received under the third section of this act, or such other legal-tender notes as may be issued in lieu thereof, in the purchase of any outstanding bonds of the United States known as 5.20 bonds at a price not exceeding their par value in coin, or in purchasing coin for the redemption of such bonds.

SEC. 5. That the legal-tender notes of the United States now outstanding or hereafter issued under the authority of law, and all reissues thereof or of legal-tender notes in lieu of any other similar notes hereafter retired and canceled, shall be, and continue to be, lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private, within the United States, except in payment of the principal and interest of the public debt: Provided, however, That during any period, when, in pursuance of the third section of this act, the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes in coin shall be suspended, such notes shall not be receivable in payment of duties on imports.

SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' approved January 14, 1875."

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to speak on the pending bill?

Mr. HILL. I do not want to make a speech; I just want to make a remark or two. I desire to do it right here, because I think this is a good opportunity for it.

The Senator from Ohio, in the very able speech which he has delivered, took occasion to make extensive extracts and quotations from the speech made by Mr. Calhoun in 1837. That same speech has been used and is now being used throughout the country to impress upon the public mind the idea that Mr. Calhoun is the author of what is known as the greenback idea, and that Mr. Calhoun favored the idea that the General Government had power to make a legal-tender paper currency. His great name as a constitutional lawyer being quoted to justify the exercise of such power is having great influence.

Now I wish to say here, and to say emphatically, that Mr. Calhoun never advanced, either directly or indirectly, by insinuation or otherwise, any such idea. The Treasury note that Mr. Calhoun suggested, in the first place, nobody was compelled to receive except the Government. Mr. Calhoun never anywhere, at any time, intimated that it was in the power of the Federal Congress to make a paper money which any individual was compelled to receive for any debt.

In the next place, Mr. Calhoun never suggested any Treasury note which was not convertible at any moment into gold or silver at the option of the holder. To make this explicit I wish to read just a moment. Mr. Calhoun said in the same speech which was quoted by the Senator from Ohio:

But, whatever may be the amount that can be circulated, I hold it clear that, to that amount, it would be as stable in value as gold and silver itself, provided the Government be bound to receive it exclusively with those metals in all its dues, and that it be left perfectly optional with those who have claims on the Government to receive it or not.

As was correctly stated by the Senator from Ohio:

It will also be a necessary condition that notes of too small a denomination should not be issued, so that the Treasury shall have ample means to meet all demands, either in gold or silver or the bills of the Government, at the option of those who have claims on it. With these conditions no further variation could take place between it and gold and silver than that which would be caused by the action of commerce.

Again I want to read an expression as to the extent to which this issue by the Government could properly go:

No one can doubt that the fact of the Government receiving and paying away bank-notes in all its fiscal transactions is one of the principal sources of their great circulation; and it was mainly on that account that the notes of the late Bank of the United States so freely circulated all over the Union. I would ask, then, why should the Government mingle its credit with that of private corporations? No one can doubt that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more stable and more safe.

To all of which I agree. Then he asks:

Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions?

Why should the Government, is the idea of Mr. Calhoun, in supplying its own necessities, in paying its own obligations, be compelled to use the notes of a private institution or a private bank instead of its own Treasury notes?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator will see in the same context, in a portion of the extract which I marked to read and insert in my speech, that Mr. Calhoun expressly also stated that the amount of this circulation would be much larger, which would be safely kept at par with coin, than the amount of the annual income of the Government.

Mr. HILL. Ah; that is all true, and it might thereby become incidentally a currency for the country, but it should be so only incidentally. Then he expresses the same idea in another place, on which my eye does not fall, but the idea is that the Government might use its own Treasury notes to the extent of its own necessities, which might exceed its income, it is true, but it should be limited by that, and that issue might become incidentally a currency in the country, but that no man should be compelled to take it; it should not be made a legal tender except only to the Government; that the Government could not compel any one to take it; that the Government alone was compelled to take its own notes. That is all of Mr. Calhoun's idea.

Mr. Calhoun closes that speech with another idea which I desire to read at this time while the papers of the country and speeches in this Congress and everywhere else are making volumes with the notion that the people in their distress are to look to the Government for relief, that they are to look to legislation for relief, to make all the poor rich. I wish to read what Mr. Calhoun said on that subject in this very speech. After drawing a very striking description of the then distressed condition of the country, financially and otherwise, he says:

As far as I possibly can consistently with the views I entertain and what I believe necessary to restore the body-politic to health, I will do everything in my power to mitigate the present distress. Further I cannot go.

After the best reflection I am of the opinion that the Government can do but little in the way of relief, and that it is a case which must be mainly left to the constitution of the patient, who, thank God, is young, vigorous, and robust, with a constitution sufficient to sustain and overcome the severest attack. I dread the doctor—

Says Mr. Calhoun, and I want these words to go to the country—

I dread the doctor and his drugs much more than the disease itself. The distress of the country consists in its indebtedness—

Precisely so now—and can only be relieved by payment of its debts. To effect this, industry, frugality, economy, and time are necessary. I rely more on the growing crop—on the cotton, rice, and tobacco of the South—than on all the projects or devices of politicians. I am utterly opposed to all coercion by this Government. But Government may do something to relieve the distress.

Now what is the something Government can do?

It is out of debt—

Unfortunately we cannot say that now. The Government then was out of debt. The Government when Mr. Calhoun spoke was a creditor, not an almost hopeless debtor. Being out of debt Mr. Calhoun continued—

It is out of debt, and is one of the principal creditors both of the banks and of the merchants, and should set an example of liberal indulgence. This I am willing to give freely. I am also prepared to vote freely the use of Government credit in some safe form to supply any deficit in the circulation during the process of recovery as far as its financial wants will permit—

So far as the Government's financial wants will permit—

I see not what more can be safely done.

And yet the man who uttered these words is now being quoted all over the country as justifying the idea of an illimitable, unlimited, irredeemable paper money made a legal tender by the Federal Congress!

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL. I am not answering the Senator now.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire to inquire whether the statement which the Senator makes is intended to convey the impression that any such idea as that was advanced by me, or that Mr. Calhoun was quoted by me as any authority for that?

Mr. HILL. Not by any means, I assure the Senator; and that was the reason why I waited until the Senator got through before I began the remarks which I am making. But the Senator having used this speech of Mr. Calhoun for another purpose, which might be used in the same connection, and having seen this speech used throughout my country almost every day, it furnished an appropriate occasion to set the matter right. I assure the Senator I am not complaining of him. Mr. Calhoun continues:

I see not what more can be safely done. But my vision may be obtuse upon this subject.

Some visions these days are not obtuse. They can see that Government can do everything to relieve the country!

Those who differ from me, and who profess so much sympathy for the public, seem to think that much relief may be afforded. I hope they will present their views. I am anxious to hear their prescriptions, and I assure them that whatever they may propose, if it shall promise relief, and be not inconsistent with the course which I deem absolutely necessary for the restoration of the country to perfect health, shall cheerfully receive my support. They may be more keen-sighted than I am as to the best means of relief, but cannot have a stronger disposition to afford it.

So I say now that I am willing to do anything that I believe it is in the power of Congress to do to bring relief to the country in its present distress, just as Mr. Calhoun said then. Those of us who do not agree with the idea that the Government can issue an unlimited irredeemable paper currency are not actuated any less by a desire to relieve the distress of the country than those gentlemen who favor that idea. But, as Mr. Calhoun said, I do not believe that this country can be ever relieved of its distresses by reason of legislation alone. Legislation alone never produced these distresses. We have passed through a war. We have had a war which has wasted property, which has destroyed values, which has deranged industry, and which, by reason of an inflated currency, has encouraged speculative adventures to an almost unlimited extent. These evil consequences have followed. I am willing to take the charter of Mr. Calhoun now; I am willing to do precisely as he said. Let this Government to the extent of its necessities issue the Treasury notes which Mr. Calhoun said could be constitutionally issued, and to that extent let it go to the relief of the country.

I might say while upon this subject that though I do not believe Congress ever had power to make any paper money a legal tender for the payment of private debts, still as it issued a legal-tender money during the war and as the Supreme Court under the war power, as I understand it, though my friend from Ohio thinks differently, held that that issue was constitutional, I am perfectly willing to recognize that issue, admitting it as a legal issue as far as it has gone. I am perfectly willing to stop its contraction. All I ask is that it shall arrive at that point where it shall be equivalent to a gold dollar or a silver dollar, and the moment it gets there stop it and let it remain the currency of the country just as long as it may. I have no objection to that at all. But, sir, when you have done that, then repeal your tax upon State banks. Get away with the idea that nothing can be safe in a State. Do not be exercising the taxing power to destroy the right of the States to charter their own banks. It never was intended that Congress should exercise the taxing power to destroy, to prohibit. The taxing power was conferred upon Congress to raise revenue, and not to destroy anything. Congress could not pass an act directly saying that a State shall not charter a State bank. Congress could not pass an act saying directly that a bank chartered by a State shall not circulate money. If it cannot do it directly by such an enactment, it cannot do it indirectly by imposing a tax which accomplishes the same result.

These things I am willing to do for the relief of the country, but I cannot stand in the Senate, a Senate made memorable by the great power of that constitutional lawyer, Mr. Calhoun, and see his name quoted, either here or elsewhere, as justifying what, in my opinion, is the most enormous exercise of power that can be claimed for any government, the right of the Government alone to make money, the right of the Government to make anything money, the right of the Government to make paper money by simply stamping on it that anybody shall take it, because the Government says so, whether it is ever to be redeemed or not, and without limit.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, have directed me to report a substitute for the bill that came from the House. This is a matter of very great importance to the people of this District. I trust that Senators will examine the bill, which will probably be laid on their tables to-morrow morning. I give notice that on Monday I shall move the consideration of the bill and ask the Senate to continue its consideration until it is concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill just reported will be placed on the Calendar.

SUBURBAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to lay aside informally the pending business in order that I may ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 532.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the bill the Senator proposes to take up?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a bill to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator think that will pass in a few moments?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it will lead to any debate. It is very important to the corporators, if the bill is to be passed at all, that it be passed at once, so that they can have the good weather of the fine season to construct their road.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senate adjourns at four o'clock by a concurrent resolution for the purpose of enabling Senators to attend the funeral of Professor Henry, the late official head of the Smithsonian Institution. The time of the funeral is set at four o'clock, and the time set by the concurrent resolution was very late. I was going to suggest to the Senate that for the purpose of enabling Senators to attend the funeral the Senate adjourn. It seems to me, as this is a lengthy bill, that it will take too much time. It might be taken up now and be acted upon to-morrow morning. I will make that suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; that will be entirely satisfactory to me, if the Senate will consent to take the bill up so that it may be acted upon at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow morning.

Mr. SARGENT. I think there is no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS. Or after the expiration of the morning hour, the idea being to get through with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the present and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of considering the bill which he has indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. For the reasons moving the Senate when it adopted the concurrent resolution that the Senate adjourn at four o'clock to-day, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask a question. The Senator from Tennessee had the present and prior orders set aside to consider his bill. I supposed we were to go on with that now. If we adjourn now will the bill of the Senator from Tennessee take precedence over the bill for the repeal of the resumption act to-morrow after the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the unfinished business, if the Senate now adjourns.

Mr. SARGENT. As I understand, it will only take a few minutes.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senate will not adjourn, but let us finish the bill moved by the Senator from Tennessee to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. I insist on my motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to state to the Senator from Kentucky that I do not think the bill that I propose to consider will lead to debate, or will consume thirty minutes in its consideration. It will be quite satisfactory to me to take it up when the morning business is concluded, within the morning hour to-morrow, if the Senate will consent to continue its consideration until it is finished.

Mr. BECK. All I desired was to say that I gave consent now to take the bill up, believing that, as we had thirty minutes before the hour fixed for adjournment, the Senator could get his bill through now. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] who is necessarily compelled to be absent, requested me to resist every effort to postpone the bill for the repeal of the resumption act, so that it may be the regular order to-morrow morning after the morning hour. If this bill is taken up to-morrow morning after the morning hour it may run two days; perhaps it will.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, are there any rules in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate do now adjourn, which is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 16, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D.D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. POTTER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the pending question is upon seconding the previous question on the preamble and resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] on Monday.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—89 in the affirmative, none in the negative.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. POTTER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. POTTER. I move a call of the House.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to move to postpone indefinitely this resolution, so as to go on with the public business?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman would vote he would help to make up a quorum so that that motion might be admissable.

Mr. PAGE. That is not the question I ask.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which is, I believe, always in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to inquire whether it would be in order at this time to raise the question of consideration on the pending resolution?

The SPEAKER. It would not be.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman certainly knows that when no quorum is present but two motions are in order; and one of those is now pending.

Mr. CONGER. I addressed myself to the Chair, not to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER. I addressed myself to the Chair, without asking the consent of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, and will do so whenever I see fit.

The motion of Mr. POTTER for a call of the House was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of an act (S. No. 1208) authorizing the publication for sale of an edition of the narrative of the Polaris expedition; in which concurrence was requested.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Douglas,	Killinger,	Robertson,	Willits.
Ellis,	Landers,	Robinson, M. S.
Foster,	Lapham,	Sapp,
Freeman,	Loring,	Sinnickson,

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. MARTIN, is detained from the Hall by the sickness of his wife. She has been very sick for several days.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call is now complete, and it appears that 247 members are present and have answered to their names.

Mr. POTTER. As a quorum is present I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the resolution offered by Mr. POTTER on Monday last.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make a proposition to gentlemen on the other side, and it is that we lay aside the unfinished business and take up for consideration pension-bills, public and private.

Mr. POTTER. We are prepared to do business and here for that purpose, but are constantly kept out of a quorum by the willful absence of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. FORT. There is a quorum present, and I submit we proceed to the consideration of pension bills, public and private.

Mr. POTTER. If there is a quorum here I am glad of it, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] on Monday last.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 133; no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum.

Mr. POTTER. I move there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Baker, William H.	Freeman,	Luttrell,	Townsend, M. I.
Bisbee,	Frye,	Overton,	Walker,
Bundy,	Gibson,	Powers,	Watson,
Butler,	Harris, Benj. W.	Quinn,	White, Harry
Carlisle,	Jorgensen,	Roberts,	Willits.
Clarke of Kentucky,	Killinger,	Robinson, M. S.
Douglas,	Landers,	Sapp,
Ellis,	Loring,	Strait,

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-three members have answered to their names, which is more than a quorum.

Mr. POTTER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 118; no 1.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. HALE demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 131; no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136, no 1.

Mr. HALE. No quorum.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to make a proposition to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE. I save the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BANKS. I propose to the gentleman from New York that we suspend action on this question until Saturday, and in the mean time go on with the appropriation bills, as the absentees, I am informed, are then expected to be present.

Mr. POTTER. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, when he proposes, as I understand he does, to go on with some other business until Saturday, whether his side of the House when we have got through with the business they have selected to be done, will be ready to vote on Saturday on the question of privilege now pending?

Mr. BANKS. I am unable to answer that question because I make this proposition on my own responsibility, and because I think the business of the country requires it. I am informed by gentlemen on the other side of the House, friends of the gentleman from New York, that they will be able to dispose of this question in their own way and to their own satisfaction by Saturday. I propose, therefore, we suspend action on this question until then, and in the mean time go on with the general appropriation bills.

Mr. POTTER. When we are assured by enough gentlemen on the other side of the House to make it certain we will have a quorum and this question will on Saturday be voted on, I will give way to other business.

Mr. BANKS. There is a quorum present now.

Mr. HALE. It is easy either to accept or decline the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Cries of "Regular order!" from the democratic side of the House.]

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to say a word on this question. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WAIT. Will not gentlemen on the other side listen to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask to be heard for three minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks to be heard for three minutes. Is there objection? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is no objection on this side at all to the gentleman from Georgia being heard.

Mr. POTTER. If I could yield to anybody it would afford me great pleasure to yield to the gentleman from Georgia. But I am not permitted to yield to anybody. I am instructed to stand where I am. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. EWING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 116, not voting 34; as follows:

NOT VOTING—34.

Baker, W. H.	Freeman,	Landers,	Sapp,

Bundy,	Hale,	Luttrell,	Strait,
Butler,	Hamilton,	Overton,	Townsend, M. I.

Davidson,	Killinger,	Robinson, G. D.
Douglas,	Knott,	Robinson, M. S.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I am paired with Mr. STRAIT, of Minnesota.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have not voted because I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. The gentleman from California, Mr. LUTTRELL, is confined to his room by sickness. If he had been here, he would have voted with this side of the House.

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. TOWNSEND. If he were here, I should vote "ay." My colleagues, Mr. QUINN and Mr. BAKER, are paired.

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with Mr. FRYE, of Maine. If he had been present, I would have voted "ay."

Mr. HAMILTON. I am paired with my colleague from Indiana, Mr. ROBINSON. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am paired with my colleague from Florida, Mr. BISBEE. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. BAYNE. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. WATSON, is paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky. Mr. WATSON would have voted "no."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. On all political questions I am paired with Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut. I have therefore abstained from voting.

Mr. MITCHELL. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. OVERTON, is still absent by leave of the House. When he went away he supposed he was paired on all political questions, but since he left the pair has been released by the return of the member with whom he was paired.

Mr. BOYD. The gentleman from New York, Mr. BUNDY, is absent by leave of the House. If he were present, he would vote "no."

REQUESTS FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement of the vote on the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to lay before the House the following requests:

Mr. METCALFE desires leave of absence for eight days, on account of sickness;

Mr. KILLINGER desires leave of absence for one week; and

Mr. SAPP desires leave of absence for three days.

Mr. HOOKER. I think it is proper, in the present condition of affairs in the House, that if these requests for leave of absence be granted, they should be granted coupled with the condition that they do not defeat the obtaining of a quorum upon a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an objection, and objection being made, the requests for leave of absence are not granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not make objection to a request for leave of absence on account of sickness. One of these gentlemen is sick.

Mr. HOOKER. Is he paired?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know about that.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire that all pairs on this question should be released, so that the House may not be deprived of a quorum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the requests for leave of absence submitted by the Chair be granted.

Mr. HOOKER. I object, if this is to prevent any gentleman from being at liberty to vote on the pending question or from making a quorum on a call of the House.

Mr. REED. The gentleman cannot make a conditional objection.

The SPEAKER. The House having determined to adjourn, it requires unanimous consent for the Speaker to make these requests in any event. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ELLIS. I rise to make a report of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House has voted to adjourn.

Mr. ELLIS. The result of the vote has not been announced. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and fifty-five minute p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 17, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask that that motion may be postponed for a while. I do not think there is a quorum present, and I think there ought to be when such a motion as that is put.

Mr. SARGENT. I give notice, then, that I will call up the motion later in the day. I submit the motion and let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. SARGENT subsequently called up the motion; and it was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of William Webb and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 979) in relation to the payment of taxes and assessments in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of the National Prohibition Alliance of the District of Columbia, praying for the abolition of the liquor traffic. This is a very elaborately drawn up petition, asking for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic in this District and all other places where the United States have exclusive jurisdiction. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ask the attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the memorial of W. P. Keady and other citizens of Oregon, printers and publishers, in which they beg leave to represent that in the tariff bill now before Congress no duty has been set upon stereotype or electrotype printing plates, and they represent that they are thereby left without any measure of protection, and would be greatly injured in their business; numerous printers, stereotypers, and electrotypers would necessarily be left without employment if that bill should become a law. They protest against it. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of George W. Lewis & Co. and others, citizens of the city of New York, praying for an increased appropriation for the improvement of the Harlem River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a memorial signed by a large number of citizens describing themselves as manufacturers of and dealers in printing materials, remonstrating against the passage of the bill for a refund to Miller & Richards, of San Francisco, of a fine of $3,183 imposed upon them, for reasons which the memorialists set forth. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of Albert Husing, editor and proprietor of the San José Courier, praying that a duty of thirty cents per pound may be levied upon all stereotype and electrotype plates imported into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I present four memorials of the Order of United American Mechanics, sent here by Joseph S. Milligan, the secretary of the order, one from Shining Light Council, No. 39, of Clinton, New Jersey; one from Byram Council, No. 78, of Stanhope, New Jersey; one from Washington Council, No. 10, of Mount Holly, New Jersey, and one from Industry Council, No. 50, of Jersey City, New Jersey, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws. I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I present the memorial of O. S. B. Wall and others, colored members of the District of Columbia Western Emigration Society, who respectfully request that "the honorable Secretary of the Treasury be authorized by appropriate legislation to advance or loan, upon the order of a properly authorized and bonded agent of the Government, the sum of $75,000 to enable the helpless poor of our race in this section to locate as farmers" on lands of the United States dedicated to homestead purposes. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of John Hunter, of Westchester County, New York, praying compensation because of the condemnation of his lands on Hart's Island, in Long Island Sound, alleged to have been taken and appropriated by the United States Government for light-house purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Mrs. W. Weckerle, widow of William Weckerle, late a private in Company H, Ninth Minnesota Volunteers, praying payment of the amount of bounty claimed to be due her late husband; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORDON. Yesterday morning I presented the petition of Juliet Leef, widow of Henry Leef, deceased, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle her claim against the Government for loss and damages sustained by the seizure and detention of the vessel Mary Teresa at the port of Bahia by order of the United States consul at that port on the 20th of January, 1848. By mistake this petition was referred to the Committee on Claims. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I move to have printed for the use of the Senate the amendment which I gave notice of my intention to propose as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency. I desire to have it reprinted in its present form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

No. 405) to amend the first paragraph of section 2541 of the Revised Statutes, relating to collection districts in the State of New Jersey, to report it adversely. It is a bill that relates to the extension of certain collection districts in the

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1083) to incorporate the Collateral Loan and Trust Company of the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 618) for the relief of Frank P. Haywood, sr., submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1203) to repeal the act of Congress approved April 3, A. D., 1878, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the support of the government for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes,'" reported it with an amendment.

REBECCA B. REMICK.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the vote by which the Senate indefinitely postponed the bill (H. R. No. 1256) granting a pension to Rebecca B. Remick, be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is now to recommit the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

TREASURY DISCREPANCIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The select committee to examine the reports, books, &c., of the Treasury Department have been at work since soon after their appointment. They have made considerable progress. The two clerks allowed the committee are now engaged in making a careful comparison of the books and annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Register, and of the Treasurer. The work is one of magnitude and importance and requires great care, skill, and labor.

Soon after the appointment of the committee a call by letter was made upon the Secretary of the Treasury and upon heads of other Departments, relating to receipts, expenditures, the public debt, issues of bonds and of currency. Some parts of the statements asked for have been furnished and will be of general interest when made public. No testimony has yet been taken by the committee. The committee are of the opinion that they cannot do full justice to the subject and make a report at this session of Congress. They therefore ask that the following resolution, which I submit, be acted upon by the Senate:

Resolved, That the "select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department," appointed under resolution of the Senate of November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation and sit during the vacation or recess of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I have not any objection to make to this resolution at the present time; still I should like to have it lie over until to-morrow. The only objection that occurs to me at the present time is that I fear it will detain my friend, the Senator from West Virginia, from his home, where he usually dispenses much hospitality during the recess, and I should hardly want to deprive him of the opportunity of displaying that generous trait of his character.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am obliged to the Senator for his kindness and for his allusion to me in a friendly manner, and as he specially smiles I shall be very glad to see him or any other Senator at any time. But I have a duty to perform which comes first, as I know it does with the Senator.

The committee have considered well the request that they make before they decided to make it. In fact it is believed that the resolution as it now stands permits the sitting during the recess of Congress, but they thought it would be better, to cover the ground so that there could be no question about it, to ask this additional privilege, supposing there could be no objection to it.

Now, Mr. President, as the resolution is to go over until to-morrow or the next legislative day, I will make a statement on my own account on which the committee has not been consulted, and I make it as an individual and member of the committee and not as coming from the committee or that the committee has been at all consulted about.

It will be recollected that I made sundry statements and several speeches to the Senate from time to time, stating that certain changes and alterations had taken place in the official annual finance reports. I now assert, after the examination as far as we have gone, that each and every one of the statements made by myself to the Senate is substantially correct; and in the end, though the committee has no desire to report and make public anything that has taken place in committee, I as an individual state that all the statements I have made, including that which alleged that the debt statements had been changed and altered by the finance reports between 1869 and 1871 to the extent of over $200,000,000, will be shown to be correct.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator whether he expects to be here so as to attend to the duties personally himself of further investigation between now and the recess?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will answer frankly to the Senator no; but the committee—not my own wish but the committee—suggest to me that it would be better so that the two clerks allowed the committee might continue their investigations during the recess. We may not meet ourselves. As I stated a moment ago, no testimony has yet been taken, and I doubt very much whether the committee will meet during the recess; but it will be borne in mind that to examine and compare properly and carefully, with a view to get all the facts, the books of the Secretary, of the Register, and of the Treasurer, is an immense work and cannot be done in a few months by any committee. We have two clerks who have been steadily at work, and I think they can be engaged until we meet again, even if the committee has no meetings, and they can report whatever they may have collected to the committee.

In addition to that, the committee called on the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of other Departments, soon after its organization, for certain statements; the statements have been given in part. I believe the other Departments have done the best they could toward furnishing them; but they are large, taking a great deal of trouble, and I make no complaint that they have not all been furnished.

Mr. MORRILL. I thought if the Senator from West Virginia was going to attend to this business personally and to be here himself I would not object. I will try not to object to-morrow morning; but I would rather see the resolution in print if he will allow it to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have not the least objection to its going over, but I thought in justice to the committee and myself to make the statement I have made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

PRINTING OF MAPS.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the maps accompanying the report of Brevet Major-General Warren upon the subject of bridging the Mississippi, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the maps illustrating the report of Brevet Major-General G. K. Warren, major of engineers, upon the subject of bridging the Mississippi River, be published with the report.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1268) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to Jacob A. T. Wendell, Henry Van Allen, and John R. Bailey a part of the military reservation of Fort Mackinac; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DENNIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1269) for the relief of the Neufchâtel Rock Paving Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1270) providing for the adjudication and issue of patents in mission-land cases in the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1271) for the relief of Jenkins A. Fitzgerald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1272) to amend section 4127 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the judicial powers and functions of consuls; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MATTHEWS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1273) granting a pension to Sarah A. Porter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1274) to pay John Hunter for part of Hart Island, in Westchester County, State of New York, condemned and taken for light-house purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BOOTH. I submit an amendment which I intend to offer to the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH. By request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] I ask consent of the Senate to make the bill (S. No. 300) amendatory of the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. WINDOM. Let it be subject to the appropriation bills, if any are ready.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that Senate bill No. 300 be made a special order for next Wednesday.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that, provided we dispose of the financial bill now before the Senate; at least, it seems to be up periodically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the Senator from California does not wish to set aside that bill.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not wish to displace the pending order.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I have no objection, if the appropriation bills and financial bills are excepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be considered agreed to, subject to the appropriation bills and finance bills. That is the understanding. ["Yes."]

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to consider and report upon the propriety of so amending the standing rules of the Senate as to admit the heads of bureaus in the Executive Departments to the floor of the Senate during its sessions.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend that resolution by inserting:

And to inquire into the propriety or expediency of adopting a rule preventing any Senator from being at the Secretary's desk while the yeas and nays are being called.

I think it is disgraceful to this body to see the manner in which Senators run to see how the yeas and nays are taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. WALLACE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ROLLINS and Mr. EUSTIS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

POST-ROUTE IN MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post-route from Hartford to Canton Village, in the county of Oxford, Maine.

JAMES C. DOWNER.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill (S. No. 849) granting a pension to James C. Downer.

It will only occupy a moment. It is a bill granting a pension to a blind man whose case is a most meritorious one. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing the name of James C. Downer, late captain of Company E in the Sixth Regiment of Louisiana Mexican War Volunteers, on the roll of invalid pensioners, at $50 per month during his natural life, commencing on the 2d of June, 1875.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 306.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to call up the bill to provide times and places of holding circuit court in the district of Iowa, and for the appointment of an additional judge.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that I have had this matter up several mornings and I think it can be disposed of in five minutes; I hope so, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Georgia."

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Oregon state what the provisions of this bill are?

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated them the other day but will do so again now.

In 1870, on the 4th of May, Congress made a grant of land to the Oregon Central Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon. The road is exclusively in the State of Oregon. The company proceeded to the construction of the road. The road is completed with the exception of about ninety miles. The time has expired, and this is an extension to enable them to complete the road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the time expired?

Mr. MITCHELL. It has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When?

Mr. MITCHELL. Under one construction it expired two years ago, and under another construction, which I think is equally reasonable, it expired on the fourth day of the present month. The bill proposes that the land shall be sold by the Government and the proceeds simply go to the company in aid of the road. That is all there is of the bill. I do not wish to take up time by discussing it. It was discussed at length the other day. I will state that the committee considered it carefully, and I believe there is no objection from any member of the committee to the bill. I make that statement. If there is any objection from any member of the Committee on Railroads, as a matter of course he can state it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long was this line of road, to begin with?

Mr. MITCHELL. About one hundred and forty miles in length—the whole road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was the first grant made?

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 4th day of May, 1870.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many miles have been built?

Mr. MITCHELL. Forty-seven and a half.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was that part completed?

Mr. MITCHELL. The first twenty miles were completed and accepted by the Government on the 16th of February, 1872. The remaining twenty-seven and a half miles were completed and accepted by the Government April 23, 1876. There are about ninety miles of the road to be completed yet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not built at all?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not built at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the fourteenth section of the amendment of the committee—I do not mean by that that I shall be in favor of the bill afterward that I know of—by striking out the words in lines 3 and 4 "having due regard for the rights of the company."

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that that amendment has already been made on my own motion when the bill was under consideration before, in order to conform with the views of the Senator and with legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if there is a question on which the opinions of the people of Ohio more nearly approach unanimity than on any other it is on the question of granting public lands to railroad companies to aid in the construction of their roads. In almost every form that can be conceived the people of that State have expressed their opinion against the policy and justice of such subsidies. They have done it in their county and district conventions; they have done it in their State conventions of all parties; they have done it through the public press, and authoritatively by the action of the General Assembly again and again. It was in obedience to that public sentiment of my State and from the dictates of my own judgment that I availed myself of the very first occasion I could obtain after I came into the Senate to express my opposition to such grants; and it so happens that it was upon the very bill making the grant which it is now sought to revive that I first had the honor to address the Senate in opposition to the grants and to the policy of such grants. But at that time, May, 1870, if I recollect the date correctly, land grants in favor of railroads passed the Senate almost as much a matter of course as the ordinary appropriation bills; and it was not until after several years of hard fighting and not until the opinion of the people of the United States became clearly ascertained that a stop was put to that policy.

But, Mr. President, although a stop has been put to original grants of land to railroad companies, a stop has not been put to another kind of subsidy; a subsidy by reviving grants that have lapsed. It may seem that there is a distinction between an original grant and a revival of a lapsed grant. I can conceive of circumstances that might make it much more justifiable to revive a lapsed grant than to have made it originally; and it is certain that the Senate has either revived lapsed grants or extended the time when they were about to lapse in more cases than one. But in every such case certain questions naturally suggest themselves before the Senate decides whether it will revive the lapsed grant or not. Here, for instance, is a grant that lapsed two years ago. By the condition on which this grant was made in 1870, this company was bound to complete its road within six years, if my memory is correct; that time expired two years ago, and we are now asked to revive that lapsed grant.

What are the questions that naturally arise in our minds when we are asked to do that thing? They are, first, what reason has this company to give in justification of its failure to perform the condition on which the grant was made? What efforts has it made to comply with that condition? What stock has been subscribed to it and what credit has been given to it on the faith of that grant which would be interfered with or destroyed if the grant were not revived?

These are the questions that naturally arise, and I have looked in vain to the report of the Railroad Committee to find any sufficient answer to them. I find no statement whatever of the amount of stock, if any, taken for the construction of this road on the faith of this land grant. I find no statement of any credit given to it or any obligations issued by it and purchased by others on the faith of any such grant. I find no statement of the efforts of this company to comply with the condition or of any overruling circumstance or fact that prevented their compliance. All that I find that bears upon the question is that the company has constructed about forty-seven and one-half miles of its road and that ninety-seven miles remain unconstructed, and so far as it appears by this report without a spade having been used upon any portion of that line. In other words, this company has had six years in which to complete about one hundred and forty miles of railroad, and it has completed only one-third of one hundred and forty miles, and two years more have elapsed and the two-thirds remain still uncompleted, and now it asks the Congress of the United States to revive this land grant while it has thus utterly failed to perform the condition on which the grant was made.

Mr. President, under such circumstances as these, totally unexplained, without its appearing at all that a failure to revive this land grant would do injustice to anybody, I for one can only regard it as a new land subsidy, standing precisely as if it came here for the first time; and I am compelled, in obedience to the dictates of my own judgment and in submission to the will of the people of Ohio, to vote against it.

But, Mr. President, if there was a case made here appealing to the equity of Congress to revive this grant, I must be allowed to say to my friend who has this bill in charge that this bill itself is obnoxious, it seems to me, to criticism of a very serious character, and is one of the most singular bills, perhaps the only one of the kind, ever introduced into the Senate. What is one of the main features of this bill? It is that if this company, which has been in default now for more than two years in the construction of its road, shall continue to be in default, then any other company may file a declaration that it will complete the road, and such other company shall then have the benefit of this grant. But it does not stop there. If this second company shall also fail, then a third company may file its intention and it may have the grant.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the object in making these grants? Is the benefit to the stockholders of the company or is the benefit to the people that is gained by the construction of the road?

Mr. THURMAN. My friend had better let me get through with what I have to say and then he may answer me altogether, and that will shorten the discussion. I do not care what the object is, I never before heard of a floating land grant, a grant here to the Oregon Central Railroad Company, and if that company does not comply with its conditions then that some other company may take the grant.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator would allow me to proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me? The Senator said he never heard of such a thing. I have heard of such a thing. The Senate, without a dissenting voice, within the last month, passed a bill almost identical with this one, only in that case, in the case of the Northern Pacific, it provided that if the Northern Pacific did not construct a certain road within a certain time, then the grant for two hundred miles should be forfeited to a certain other company who should go on and construct the road; so that the principle adopted by the Senate without a dissenting voice within the last month is the same as that now in this bill, in so far as that is concerned.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I was not in the Senate when that bill was passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe I was not in Washington at that time. I think I was on a visit home. I noticed in the newspapers that it had passed. I noticed that the yeas and nays were not called upon it. I noticed that there was no discussion upon it that amounted to anything like a discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was discussed for two days.

Mr. THURMAN. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator certainly does not wish to misrepresent the fact. He has been misinformed; that is all.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think that there was anything like a full discussion of that measure; certainly no discussion on the question that I now raise in respect of this bill. I do not think it ever entered into the imagination of any Senator here that we were to make grants of floats, as they used to be called in the Spanish land grants and the French land grants, to let them float from one company to another, and another, and another.

Mr. President, who is to determine whether the Oregon Central Railroad Company shall have failed and shall have forfeited its right to this land grant? Usually, certainly the general principle is that a party shall not lose his franchise or his estate without the adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction. Who is to decide that the Oregon Central Railroad Company has failed to perform the condition and thereby has forfeited the grant made to it? There is no provision for any such determination; but upon a filing with the Secretary of the Interior by some other company of "a notice of its intention to construct such road and telegraph line in the event of a failure on the part of said Oregon Central Railroad Company, it may, at any time within three months after such failure upon the part of the said Oregon Central Railroad Company either to commence or prosecute as aforesaid, proceed, in like manner and upon like conditions, to the commencement and construction of such road," &c., and then it shall have the land grant. This bill seems to contemplate that immediately upon its approval, when it becomes a law, Company A, Company B, Company C, and Company D may file in the Department of the Interior a declaration that if the Oregon Central Company shall fail to commence within the time limited here, and to prosecute, as herein provided, the construction of its road, then Company A will undertake the job, and then if Company A fails, Company B, which next filed such a notice, will undertake the job, and Company C and Company D, and so on, until at last these ninety-seven miles of road are made. Is not that a most extraordinary proposition? And all this without an adjudication by any tribunal authorized to adjudicate at all that the company which it is thus sought to supersede has been guilty of any default or has forfeited any right whatsoever!

Mr. President, I cannot vote for such a bill as that. I could not vote for it even if there were a provision for an adjudication that the forfeiture had taken place; but without any such adjudication, without anybody to hear or determine the question as to whether the default has taken place and that a forfeiture has been incurred, or any such thing as that, I am quite sure I cannot vote for the bill, and I hardly think that any other Senator can.

But that is not all in respect of this bill. Section 2 of the substitute provides:

> That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices the lands embraced in such entry shall not be held as within the grant to said company, and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and under the provisions of this section, and in case of abandonment by them shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only of actual settlers.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator who has charge of this bill to the words "and under the provisions of this section." What is the meaning of that? There may be some explanation of it, but I do not see it. Patents are to be granted to pre-emption and homestead claims, as I take it, under the existing laws relative to pre-emptions and to homesteads; and how they can be granted "under the provisions of this section" I really do not understand.

But let us pass further to something that is more important——

Mr. MITCHELL. I will simply say in answer to that point that that section is precisely similar to the one incorporated in the Northern Pacific bill which was passed by the Senate two years ago, and also in the bill of the present session.

Mr. THURMAN. We know that sometimes bills pass without the scrutiny that they should receive. That is all the answer I make to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. It simply protects the settlers.

Mr. THURMAN. Section 8 provides:

> And the proceeds of all sales of pre-emptions which have not been paid to the United States prior to the completion and acceptance of any one or more sections as aforesaid shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and by the Secretary of the Treasury paid to said railroad company, its trustees or assigns.

Mark it; section 2 says that, if there are inchoate pre-emption or homestead claims prior to the withdrawal of the land by the Department of the Interior, such lands upon which there are such claims shall not be in the grant to the railroad company; they are excepted from the grant; and yet section 8 provides that "the proceeds of all sales of pre-emptions which have not been paid to the United States prior to the completion and acceptance of any one or more sections as aforesaid shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States," which would embrace, if I understand it aright, precisely those homesteads and pre emptions which it is said are not within the grant.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, he does not understand the bill at all. The two sections relate to entirely different classes of cases. Section 7 relates exclusively to cases where settlers have gone on to the lands and initiated their claims after the filing of the map in the General Land Office in the Interior Department, and before any notice of that fact had reached the local district land office. That section applies to that class of cases and to that class of cases only, while the other section refers to an entirely different class; that is, to settlers whose claims have been initiated but not perfected on lands opposite to and conterminous with a certain section of completed road.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, if the Senator has explained that to his own satisfaction, I humbly venture to suggest that he is the only Senator who understands it, because there is nothing plainer to me, I cannot see anything plainer than the justice of the criticism that I make. Here is the second section, which says in so many words—

That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the lands embraced in such entry shall not be held as within the grant to said company.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly. That is, they shall not be compelled to pay $2.50 an acre, but they shall be entitled to the patent as though no grant had ever been made.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will——

Mr. MITCHELL. Because the claim——

Mr. THURMAN. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to explain the meaning.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator can explain the section after I get through. I say the language here is clear as language can be that these lands for which pre-emptions or homesteads have been initiated shall not be within the grant to the railroad company at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, if the Senator will allow me, as to all those cases where settlers have initiated their claims prior to the time of notice being filed with the local land offices of the withdrawal of the grant. It only applies to those cases.

Mr. THURMAN. I have read it twice, and said again and again that in all those cases where homesteads or pre-emptions have been initiated before the withdrawal of the lands from entry those lands for which pre-emptions and homesteads have thus been initiated shall not be within the grant to the company.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly. Now section 8——

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there is no use in attempting to proceed with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator declines an explanation I will not endeavor to make it.

Mr. THURMAN. I decline because we shall be talking back and forth here all day. I do not want to take long, and the Senator has the whole day before him.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator knows full well that this bill falls when the clock strikes one, and that I shall have no chance to answer after that time.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator would speak until one, if I yielded, and I should have no chance to make my objection. That only proves that the bill will not be passed to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. It may prove that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the 29th of April calling for information as to money expended by the United States for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, a letter from the Chief of Engineers and report from Major D. C. Houston; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ISABELLA CASSIDY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask permission to make a report at this time. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2028) granting a pension to Isabella Cassidy, direct me to make a favorable report.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill is one that ought to be passed in the interest of humanity at once, without delay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us pass it, then.

Mr. INGALLS. The beneficiary is in a state of absolute want bordering on starvation. I ask that the bill may be acted on now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Isabella Cassidy, dependent mother of George H. Cassidy, late a lieutenant in the Sixteenth Regiment Virginia Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBURBAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 532.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to take the floor on the resumption-repeal bill, but I do not wish to speak to-day, and if there is no other Senator who desires to occupy the attention of the Senate to-day upon that subject I will ask to have it postponed until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will follow the present bill. Senate bill No. 532, called up by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] is the unfinished business. The resumption-repeal bill has been superseded.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That Joseph B. Bryan, Robert K. Elliott, J. Sayles Brown, B. F. Guy, George W. Linville, John J. Johnson, W. G. Palmer, Octavius Knight, Amos Hunt, Andrew Kremer, William H. Claggett, John C. McKelden, Walter R. Irwin, Leopold Lochs, John W. Boteler, Franklin Rives, Lewis Clephane, Clark Mills, and H. Nelson Chapman, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a body-corporate by the name, style, and title of the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with power to sue and subject of being sued, plead and being impleaded; and cause to be made for the use of said company a seal, and the same to change at pleasure; with authority to construct a single or double track railway, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, within the city of Washington, and extending the same beyond the boundary of said city, as hereinafter described, within said District.

SEC. 2. The said railway shall commence at or near the junction of Nineteenth and E streets, northeast, as represented and described on the survey and plat of Rosedale and Isherwood estates, additions to the city of Washington; thence northerly through said Nineteenth street to its termination at the Benning's Bridge road; thence in a northwesterly direction, so as to form an easy curve for the working of cars; and thence northerly and parallel with a private road owned and used by Bernard Guyer, John Ebbert, Andrew Darr, Leonard Seller, Valentine Hess, —— Phillips, and Joseph Miller; thence near the base and on the easterly side of "Mulligan Hill;" thence through lands of Walter R. Irwin and lands belonging to the estate of the late William Hickey; and thence crossing the old turnpike at a point near the northwest corner of the farm upon which is located the Boys' Reform School, and continuing in a northerly direction to the most feasible point of crossing the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company, and through the lands of J. Sayles Brown to the State line of Maryland.

SEC. 3. There shall be two branches of said railway, namely: the first commencing at the western terminus of said railway and running in a westerly direction parallel with lands of William H. Claggett, described on the plat of Rosedale and Isherwood as No. 25, and lands of Andrew Kremer, to junction with F street and Fifteenth street, northeast; thence through said F street to its junction with New Jersey avenue; thence southward through said avenue to C street, northwest; thence through C street to First street, northwest; thence through Indiana avenue to a point at or near the front entrance of the east wing of the City Hall: Provided, That if on an examination by a competent engineer it shall appear that the public interests and convenience shall be subserved thereby, the said company are hereby authorized to lay a single track only from New Jersey avenue at its intersection with D street and through said street northward to the intersection of the same with Indiana avenue to the point of terminus, as hereinbefore mentioned. The second branch of said railway shall commence from the aforesaid western terminus and be located on Nineteenth street, east, passing in front of the jail of said District, to Georgia avenue; thence through said avenue to a point near the northern entrance of the navy-yard, and no further.

SEC. 4. The said railway and its branches shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real and personal property, shall be liable to taxation as other real and personal property, and to none other.

SEC. 5. That the capital of said company shall not exceed $250,000, to be divided into shares of $50 each, and shall be deemed personal property, and transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company shall direct.

SEC. 6. That the said company are hereby authorized to appropriate, outside the limits of the city of Washington, a strip of land on the route of said road twenty-five feet in width, with a gauge of track not to exceed three feet in the clear, which said gauge shall be alike applicable to the branches, and shall furnish commodious and comfortable cars for use on said road; shall, also, provide shelter at stations for passengers, and ticket offices as the business of the company shall require; and shall have the right to run public carriages thereon, propelled by steam or other approved motor power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding five cents a passenger within the city limits, and five cents additional to the line of the District: Provided, That in case of consolidation with any railway company belonging within the jurisdiction of Maryland, and leading from Hyattsville to the aforesaid District line, the fare shall not in the whole distance of the said consolidated railway exceed twelve cents per passenger.

SEC. 7. That nothing herein contained shall prevent the Government of the United States from altering the grade or otherwise improving the streets and avenues through which said railway track or tracks shall be laid, and in such event it shall be the duty of the said railway company to conform to such alterations and improvements. And it shall be the duty of said railway company to keep said tracks, and for the space of two feet beyond the outer rail thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times as well paved as other portions of said streets are paved, and in good order, without expense to the United States, the city of Washington, or the District of Columbia; and that said railway tracks shall be laid in the center of the streets, as near as may be, in the most approved manner adapted to street railways, with rails of the most approved pattern, to be determined by the chief executive authority of the District of Columbia; the rails to be laid upon an even surface with the pavement where the streets are paved, and where the streets are not paved, upon an even surface with the grade of the street; and the space between the tracks shall not be more than six feet within the city limits.

SEC. 8. In consideration of the concessions of the right of way through the streets and avenues of the city of Washington, as heretofore mentioned, by the Government of the United States, it shall be obligatory upon the said railroad company, upon the completion of the F street branch aforesaid, to place upon said track such prison van or vans as the Government shall provide, for the purpose of transmitting, from time to time, as the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall order and direct, all prisoners held in custody in the jail of the District of Columbia to the City Hall and returning the same to said jail, for which service the said railway company shall be entitled to such compensation annually as shall be reasonable and just, to be paid as other expenses of the supreme court of the District of Columbia are paid.

SEC. 9. That whenever the owners of land through which it is purposed to build said railway shall refuse to agree with the said company as to the price to be paid for the right of way contemplated in section 2 of this act, it shall be lawful for the said railway company to apply to the proper authority of said District for such relief as may be required, and in the manner provided in chapter 18, class 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1874, in relation to the condemnation of lands for railway purposes.

SEC. 10. That within thirty days after the passage and approval of this act, the corporators herein named, or a majority of them, or if any refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to so much of the capital stock of said company as shall be necessary to build and equip said railway, the amount to be determined by said corporators, to be opened, and kept open, in some convenient place or places in the city of Washington, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give notice, by advertisement in some daily paper published in said city, of the time and place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers to said stock on said books shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no person shall be permitted to subscribe for more than two hundred shares: Provided further, That each subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing 15 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the treasurer appointed by said corporators, or said subscription shall be null and void. If at the end of twenty days a larger amount than is estimated to be sufficient to construct and equip the railway as aforesaid shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed, and the corporators herein named shall proceed to apportion the stock so taken among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be completed on the day the books are closed: Provided, That nothing shall be received in payment of the percentage as aforesaid but money. When the books of subscription of stock shall be closed as aforesaid, the corporators, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within ten days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company to meet within ten days thereafter for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in some daily paper published in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notices to each stockholder by the secretary of said company. And in all meetings of stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, which may be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 11. That the government of the affairs of the said company shall be vested in a board of directors, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold office for one year, and until others are duly elected and inducted to take their places. A majority of said directors, the president being one, shall constitute a quorum; shall elect a president of the board, who shall be president of the company; they shall also choose a secretary and treasurer, the latter giving bond with security to said company in such sum as shall be prescribed by the directors, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in said board by death, resignation, or otherwise, the same shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 12. That the directors shall have power to make such by-laws and regulations as shall be needful respecting the disposition and management of the stock, estate, and effects of said company, not contrary to this act or the laws of the United States, and especially those enacted for the government of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the directors of said company shall have power to require the subscribers to the stock to pay the amount subscribed at such time, (after the first installment,) in such manner, and in such amounts as they may deem proper; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his stock as shall pay said installments, under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of the company, or said body-corporate may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 13. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for the choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place and under such conditions as the directors shall prescribe; and the said directors shall make a detailed report annually of their doings to the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 14. That all persons exercising municipal authority in said District, the officers or agents of any body-corporate within said District, are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railway herein authorized.

SEC. 15. That said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of said railway. And if any person or persons shall willfully and wrongfully obstruct or impede the passage of, or destroy or injure the cars, depots, stations, or any other property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of $10 to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties are in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within ninety days after said offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 16. That the construction of said railway shall be completed within two years after the passage of this act; otherwise all rights and privileges herein contained shall cease and be determined.

SEC. 17. That no person shall be prohibited the privilege to travel on any part of said railway, or ejected from the cars thereof, for any other cause than that of being drunk, profane, disorderly, unclean, contagiously diseased, or refusing to pay the legal fare demanded, or to comply with the general regulations of the company.

SEC. 18. That for the purpose of facilitating the construction of said railway and equipping the same, the said company is hereby authorized to borrow money to any amount not exceeding $150,000, at a rate of interest not to exceed 8 per cent. thereon, payable annually for the first two years of the loan, and to issue coupon bonds therefor, in sums of $20; and, to secure the payment of said bonds and the interest accruing thereon, shall execute and deliver to such trustee or trustees as shall be selected by the president and directors of said company, a mortgage or mortgages of all or any part of the property belonging to said company: Provided, That the interest accruing on said bonds after two years have expired as aforesaid shall be paid semi-annually.

SEC. 19. That the transit of the cars of said company on any portion of said railway within the city limits shall not exceed six miles per hour: Provided always, That at all crossings of streets, the momentum of the cars shall be reduced to a rate so slow as to be instantly stopped; and when receiving and discharging passengers the motion of the cars shall cease.

SEC. 20. That whenever the line of any railway of similar construction in the State of Maryland shall be desirous of passing cars over the railway hereby established without break or interruption, such foreign railway company is hereby authorized to consolidate with the railway company hereby created by entering into an arrangement, under the corporate seal of each, prescribing the terms and conditions thereof; the mode of carrying the same into effect; the name of the new corporation; the number of its directors, which shall not exceed thirteen, nor a less number than seven; the time and place of holding the first election for directors; to fix and establish the capital stock of said company, not exceeding $300,000, the shares being limited to $50 in amount; the manner of converting the shares of capital stock in said corporations in shares in such new corporation; the manner of compensating stockholders in each of said corporations who refuse to convert their stock into stock of the new corporation; with such other details as shall be necessary to perfect the consolidation of said corporations; and such new corporation shall possess all the powers, rights, and franchises conferred originally upon said corporations, and shall be subject to all the restrictions and perform all the duties imposed by this act.

SEC. 21. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 2 of section 11, after the word "directors," I move to insert "the number of which shall be determined by the company."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to add to section 14:

Provided, That said railway company shall be subject to such rules and regulations in operating said road as may be prescribed by the executive authority of the District of Columbia for the convenience and safety of the public.

Mr. CONKLING. That amendment perhaps presents a good opportunity for me to ask a question which occurs to me. If I understand the bill aright, the road is to start at the City Hall at one end. That is to be a terminus.

Mr. HARRIS. One branch goes to the City Hall.

Mr. CONKLING. Counting one way, that is one terminus of the road; it runs thence by F street, New Jersey avenue, and C street perhaps, to the jail. Am I right in that?

Mr. HARRIS. It runs from the beginning of the road, as stated in the bill, on Nineteenth street, northeast, down F street to New Jersey avenue, up the avenue to D street or Indiana avenue, and then to the City Hall. That is the route described.

Mr. CONKLING. That is only stating the distance in the reverse way, and of course that makes no difference to my inquiry. The bill provides that the cars are to be drawn by steam or other approved motive power, if I caught the words. The inquiry I wish to make is, whether it is designed that steam, and steam not even restricted to dummy engines, is to be used to draw cars through the streets of the city which the Senator has named?

Mr. HARRIS. The bill provides for the use of steam. It prohibits a higher rate of speed, however, than six miles per hour.

Mr. CONKLING. But it does not confine the use of locomotives to any particular kind of locomotive.

Mr. HARRIS. It does not as the bill at present stands.

Mr. CONKLING. So that if I comprehend the Senator, in the vicinity of the City Hall and on the route which has been described, railway carriages are to be drawn by ordinary locomotives with a regular smoke-stack and all the other things which go to terrify horses.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that such a thing is possible under the language of the bill, but no such thing is contemplated.

Mr. CONKLING. I take it that a bill should always be drawn as a declaration would be drawn, so as to be good on demurrer. An act of Congress should not authorize inadmissible things trusting to Providence that nobody will wish to do those things. In other words, to take as strong an illustration as I can think of at the moment, if it is not proposed that in the heart of a great and growing city locomotive-engines shall draw cars, an act of Congress granting a charter to a corporation should not authorize that to be done. Unfortunately, the cupidity of man, the money-making opportunity, and the motive which enter into such work, give us large assurance that if you say steam may be used to draw railway carriages through the city of Washington, steam will be used, because demonstratively it is the cheapest, the most certain, the most powerful motive power which up to this time we know anything about. I do not speak of speculative theories about the Keeley motor and other things, but I speak about ascertained agents of locomotion when I say that steam and locomotive engines are the very agency to which, if permission is given, the interest of those concerned would lead them to resort.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from New York that if he will look to section 6, line 10, it provides for the use of steam——

Mr. CONKLING. I have not the bill before me, and I am only speaking by hearing the reading.

Mr. HARRIS. The suggestion I make is that the Senator propose an amendment which will confine the company to the dummy-engine. I shall very cheerfully allow such an amendment or accept such an amendment to the bill. I have no objection to confining it to the dummy-engine or prohibiting the use of the ordinary steam-engine described by the Senator, for no such thing was contemplated, nor is it desirable to grant the power to use it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I have in years gone by struggled somewhat to have a measure adopted by which the street railroads of this city should be organized in such a manner as to accommodate the largest number with the least inconvenience and expense to the city. All these roads that run through our streets and avenues here are comparatively a convenience to many of the people but also a nuisance to a great many other people, because they are not and cannot be kept in such repair that a vehicle can cross over them without inconvenience. That may be seen by examining any of these long thoroughfares which run through the city in all directions. I think I have never seen so much chaos and absolute confusion as there is in the present arrangement of the street railroads of this city. Many come, as the persons that propose to be incorporated here, and ask for a charter, running here, there, and everywhere in a zig-zag manner, and when they find that the company's receipts are unproductive then they come to Congress and want an enlargement and extension to other portions of the city so that they can obtain more patronage and make their company better paying. I have no doubt that this will be the result in this case; that after the company has been organized, even if they go on and complete the road, they will find it in the end unprofitable and they will then come here and ask us for a further extension in some other direction; and yet this bill proposes to let this road go through three of the largest avenues, New Jersey, Georgia, and Indiana, besides ever so many more streets.

In the first place they propose to start out by the jail, running up on Nineteenth street, northeast, out of the city and around the city until they come in on Fifteenth street down to F street and across near the City Hall and by Indiana avenue, and so on around to the point of beginning. It is a long way.

Mr. President, this bill seems to me to have been gotten up by the persons in interest, and not by the committee. It cannot be possible that the Committee on the District of Columbia have reported this bill. There is not any provision by which the stockholders of the company will be required to pay in any considerable amount of money before they can go on and organize and run in debt $150,000. There is a provision here in relation to the corporators, but the amount is left entirely to them. They may subscribe for three shares at a dollar a share, for aught there is in this bill, and then proceed after paying 15 per cent. upon it to organize. Is that such a bill as the Senate of the United States ought to be called upon to consider? I certainly think it is an oversight on the part of the committee. They cannot have looked at the process for speculation that is allowed in this bill. These incorporators may go on with the least possible outlay and organize the company, and then they are authorized to mortgage their property to the extent of $150,000, and pay 8 per cent. on their bonds.

Then again there is another thing that I had hoped the Committee on the District of Columbia would consider in relation to its application to all the street railroads in this District; and that is, that instead of providing that they shall be taxed as real estate and personal property, they should be made to contribute something from their gross receipts, nothing more than an equitable sum, but let it be fixed upon their gross receipts so as to help pay the large expenditures that this city incurs in relation to these roads, and for all other subjects. These roads can well afford to do this. They are allowed to lay their tracks upon the avennes and streets already graded; they have nothing to pay for the land that they take, and nothing at all for grading; and it seems to me no more than just and proper that they should all be made to pay something on their gross receipts. I would not put it upon their net receipts, for I know that then their accounts could be cooked up, and we might not make such a tax very available.

Then, again, by examining this bill, as has already been referred to by the Senator from New York, there is a proposition to allow this road to run by steam or any other motive power. Of course the Senate having its attention called to that subject would not for a moment permit anything of that kind to be done. I believe that everywhere where it has been tried, except upon some of the elevated street railways, the system of using steam has been abandoned as perilous to the inhabitants of any city and as not profitable even to the companies themselves.

If you will examine this bill still further, Mr. President, you will find that there is large power lodged in the company in relation to whom they may expel from the cars. It says:

> That no person shall be prohibited the privilege to travel on any part of said railway, or ejected from the cars thereof, for any other cause than that of being drunk, profane, disorderly, unclean, contagiously diseased, or refusing to pay the legal fare demanded, or to comply with the general regulations of the company.

It might be part of "the general regulations of the company" that colored persons should be excluded. All the exclusions specified are extremely proper; but after all any further matter that might be adopted as a general regulation of the company is left entirely open.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, in order to guide my vote on the bill, is there any provision made in this bill requiring the company to provide seats for the passengers.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think there is. There is a provision requiring them to provide cars, but nothing in relation to seats.

Mr. BECK. Under the arrangements we now have in this District, and I believe in many parts of the country, passengers are packed into street cars like sardines or something else, whereas it seems to me that each railroad company ought to be required to furnish sufficient cars to accommodate the public and a seat for each passenger who pays his fare; and this packing of people in the cars who have to stand and hang on, ought to be prohibited by law. I believe it is not permitted in any other country than this. Why, when people pay their fare the company should not be required to furnish passengers a seat and not allow any more passengers to come in the car than can have comfortable seats, has always seemed to me strange. I think it is wrong, and I hope no bill for a new street railroad here will pass the Senate that does not make that provision.

Mr. MORRILL. That is a very proper suggestion; but I have said nearly all that I proposed to say on the subject. As I said in the outset, I hoped the Committee on the District of Columbia would propose some commission to report on the propriety of every new application in regard to railroads for the accommodation of this city in order that there might be some system by which the people could be accommodated and by which Congress would be enabled to act more intelligently upon these bills that are presented in regard to new roads.

And now, Mr. President, although I suppose the committee have been importuned by ever so many outsiders and would be glad to be rid of this bill, yet I think there are so many things in it which have not been considered by the committee that I shall ask to have it recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing for an equitable tax on the gross receipts of the railroad companies therein provided for, and of providing for a fixed amount of capital and the number of shares subscribed for prior to any organization of the company, and of prohibiting the use of steam thereon within the city of Washington, and diminishing the number of avenues and streets through which said road may be authorized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill. The Committee on the District of Columbia have considered it and a subcommittee of that committee have gone over the entire line of road proposed to be built. Being one of that subcommittee myself, when I started to examine the route upon which this road is proposed to be built I did so with a thorough conviction that steam should not be permitted to be used within the limits of the city; but upon examining the streets through which the road is to pass, seeing the sparse population, the total absence of danger or inconvenience until you get within one or two squares of the City Hall, the subcommittee were satisfied that the company should have the privilege of using the dummy-engine in propelling their cars.

The Senator from Vermont is quite right when he says that the original draft of this bill he supposed to have been drawn by the corporators. The bill was so drawn and introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee carefully considered the bill and incorporated a large number of amendments, and even finally prepared a bill as a substitute, making a great many restrictions that were not contained in the original bill, and all the restrictions that the Committee on the District of Columbia deemed necessary, except perhaps the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. It is proper, in my judgment, that the company shall be restricted to the use of the dummy-engine and prohibited from using the ordinary engine.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator alludes to me, I may be allowed to say that such an amendment as he speaks of is easier suggested than drawn so as to be effective. I have been trying it in two or three ways, and I will read to the Senator and to the Senate the only thing that occurs to me, and I read it to show, as I think it will, that consideration by a committee or those understanding it better would make it much more effectual than these words make it:

> Propelled by steam or other motive power except within the limits of the city of Washington; and within the limits of said city steam shall not be used except in dummy-engines so constructed and operated as not to emit sparks, smoke, or steam, and to run without noise occasioned by fire or steam.

I am not prepared to say that any dummy-engine comes up to that requirement. I am, however, I think warranted in saying that steam should not be used in the streets of a city unless by some apparatus or machine which does come up to it; for if steam is to escape, if sparks are to escape particularly in the evening, if a steam-whistle is to be employed, if there is to be anything extraordinary presented either to the ears or the eyes of horses, accidents are to occur; and the Senator will see that here in a moment in the Senate it is very difficult for one not more skilled in such specialties than I am to produce an amendment which will answer the purpose. If the Senator would forego his objection to having the bill go back to the committee, very likely upon consultation with some practical railroad man, some man skilled in the subject of dummy-engines running noiselessly on trams, they could devise an amendment much more certain to be right than this is.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from New York deem it necessary to incorporate in his amendment all those restrictions, that the dummy-engine shall not emit sparks, or smoke, or steam?

Mr. CONKLING. I should think so. The honorable Senator knows that "a dummy-engine" is a generic term, to distinguish a certain kind of engine from a regular locomotive-engine. If the Senator has observed them at all, he knows that some of them are very noisy, very demonstrative, substantially as objectionable as a small locomotive, whereas others—one has recently been exhibited in this city of the kind—profess to be noiseless and to move as if automatic, to slide along the tracks giving no token, either by the emission of steam, or fire, or sparks, or by the creation of sound, that they are propelled by steam. Then if you say merely "a dummy-engine," it is a description so vague that under the bill the same objection might be found in substance as would arise from using a locomotive, whereas if you say a dummy-engine and prescribe the requisites, then you insure such a dummy as is required.

Mr. HARRIS. The objection to the amendment of the Senator from New York is my apprehension that no dummy-engine has been invented, and I fear none will be, that will answer all the requirements of his amendment. I am perfectly willing to require the use of the most approved character of dummy-engine, the best that has been invented, and to secure the most perfect safety that such requirement can secure for the public against the danger and the evils to which the Senator has referred; but I doubt whether there has been any invention or can be one that will come up to the requirement suggested.

Mr. CONKLING. The bill, if it becomes an act, speaks as long as it lives, speaks afresh all the time. The matter of dummy-engines is rather in its infancy. This road starts next year, and the most approved dummy-engine that is in existence then is employed. It turns out to be very defective. In subsequent years, better engines are made. Which engine would such an amendment as the Senator proposes require this company to employ? I take it only the original outfit would be required, and that might turn out to be just as noisy, just as frightful to horses, and just as dangerous to life and limb in a city as a locomotive.

Mr. HARRIS. The last section of the bill reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal; and when a better engine is invented, it will be perfectly competent to require the company to adopt and use that better engine. This bill would certainly only require it to use the best that is now known; and when a better shall be invented, we have our remedy by the right to alter, amend, or repeal. We can require the company to adopt the best.

Mr. CONKLING. Such a reservation as that has been made to do a great many things. I do not know but that it would be made to answer after a corporation, strictly within the limits of its charter, had invested a large sum of money in rolling-stock, if Congress thought some other rolling-stock would be better; I do not know but that it would go so far as to give Congress the right, certainly it would give it the physical power, to say a year after "you must dispense with this rolling-stock;" and if, in the mean time improvements occur, the next year to dispense with it again and to require a fresh outfit of rolling-apparatus every year. But I rather think no Congress would ever exert such a power.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia which reported this bill; but I do not remember ever to have seen it before. My personal attention has never been called to it, although I have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that this is my own fault, for I presume that when the bill was under consideration before the committee I was from some reason or other absent, and that I should have examined the files when the matter came before the committee for its final consideration. I am therefore more free to say that, if my attention had been called to this bill, there are some provisions in it that never would have received my assent.

It has been a cardinal rule of action with me as a member of that committee never to permit any acts of incorporation to be passed where the object sought to be attained could be reached under the general incorporation law which Congress has passed for the control of such affairs in this District. There is an insuperable objection in my mind to the passage of laws of this description by Congress, and the reasons are multifold. In the first place, it is impossible for Congress to give that careful attention to acts of this kind so that extraordinary and dangerous powers are apt to creep into bills and escape attention, and thereby raise formidable monopolies or dangerous privileges.

I have given a casual examination since this bill came up to the general provisions of the incorporation act for this District, and I have no hesitation in saying that all the just powers that are claimed by these corporators could properly have been exercised under the general law. Therefore, to my mind, upon this ground, if no other, this bill is very obnoxious, and I hope that the Senator from Tennessee who has the bill in charge will not object to the recommitment of the bill, for I am very clear that it requires examinations upon other points than those that have been named. I shall allude to one.

In the second section of the bill, in lines 13, 14, and 15, there is the privilege given to this corporation to pass through property owned by the Government of the United States, without compensation.

Mr. HARRIS. What property, will the Senator inform me?

Mr. INGALLS. "The farm upon which is located the Boys' Reform School."

Mr. HARRIS. On the contrary, it runs up to it and around it. It does not pass through the farm.

Mr. INGALLS. Then, if that is the case, section 8 would require amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the Senator the substitute or the original bill in his hand?

Mr. INGALLS. I have the bill with amendments reported from the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. The substitute is under consideration. The bill was recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia at one time, and a substitute was reported. The Senator has not the right copy.

Mr. INGALLS. I sent to the document-room for the bill and I have "S. No. 532," "reported by Mr. HARRIS, with amendments, to wit: omit the parts struck through and insert the parts printed in italics."

Mr. HARRIS. But the substitute reported on the 8th of April is the measure under consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have a copy of that bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator from Kansas is looking for the section which provides a partnership on the part of the Government with the company where the Government has to furnish a van and account to the company every year for its services, he will find it at the bottom of page 5 and on page 6.

Mr. INGALLS. I have that. The provision to which the Senator from Vermont alludes is also very objectionable, declaring that in consideration of certain concessions this company are to construct a lateral road connecting with a branch at the junction of F and Fourth streets. The impression that is left in my mind is that the bill proposes to confer some special privilege upon the Government by the transportation of prisoners to and from the City Hall to the jail, and upon "such compensation annually," the bill continues, "as shall be reasonable and just, to be paid as other expenses of the supreme court of the District of Columbia are paid." That provision appears to me to commit the Government to a contract without consideration. I am by no means sure that under the provisions of this bill these corporators could not insist that they had the exclusive right to transport all prisoners to and from the City Hall and the jail and require compensation for the same, perhaps at their own rate, to be taxed as costs in the cases where the commitments may be made.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, by examining that section he will find that the right to put prison vans on that branch of the road is secured to the Government. If the Government shall elect to exercise the privilege, this railroad company proposes to run those prison vans according to the convenience and orders of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for a reasonable compensation; but it is for the Government to determine whether it will exercise the privilege secured of putting those vans on the road.

Mr. INGALLS. But this is not a road to be used exclusively by the Government, as I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. By no means.

Mr. INGALLS. And yet the impression that the section leaves on my mind, as I read it, is that here is some special benefit to be conferred upon the Government, that by the construction of this lateral branch some great advantage or benefit is to be secured to the Government of the United States. I conceive that the object of the bill is to gain some additional profit to the corporators at the expense of the Government, although it is so cunningly devised in language that it does not very clearly carry out that idea.

Mr. HARRIS. "So cunningly" that no court will ever discover it.

Mr. INGALLS. But again this bill is objectionable to my mind because it provides in section 20 for the consolidation of this corporation with similar corporations in the State of Maryland, and permits them to operate from that State through cars that will be practically beyond our jurisdiction and control.

> Such foreign railway company is hereby authorized to consolidate with the railway company hereby created by entering into an arrangement, under the corporate seal of each, prescribing the terms and conditions thereof; the mode of carrying the same into effect; the name of the new corporation.

No sanction of Congress is required; but at the option of a foreign corporation contracting with the one hereby created the power is given to form a new corporation, with new corporate powers, exercising new privileges and functions within this District, and to a certain extent beyond the control of Congress.

I presume there are other points in which the bill might be criticised. I agree particularly with what has been said in regard to the provision permitting the use of steam as a motor power. This is intended to be a street railway, and the profitable part of it will be operated almost exclusively through the thickly settled portions of this city. It is the experience of all cities and towns where steam in any form in any apparatus in connection with any machinery is employed, that it is uniformly destructive to the use of those highways for other traffic that is drawn by horses. I never could consent to the passage of this bill unless that provision were stricken out. Instead of consenting to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, that some approved and hitherto unused form of dummy-engine shall be obtained, I should prefer that an amendment be made that these cars be drawn by horses as other street-railway cars in the city are operated.

I think, Mr. President, the bill had better go back to the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, as to the general policy of incorporating street-railway companies, I have nothing to say; it may be wise or unwise; but as to the general principles of this bill I have taken occasion to carefully compare its provisions with the acts of incorporation to other street-railway companies granted by Congress in the city of Washington. They are substantially the same, with the exception of the use of steam, as is authorized by this bill.

There is no necessity of recommitting the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia. We have considered it, and there is no necessity for our considering it further. If it is deemed unwise and improper to grant the charter, the Committee on the District of Columbia certainly have no objection to the Senate so deciding, but they do desire that the Senate shall dispose of the matter one way or the other. If there be imperfections we can remedy them here as well as elsewhere. If it be deemed unsafe to allow the use of steam on this railroad, let the Senator from Kansas move to strike out that clause and insert that the power to be used shall be horse-power. I have no objection to taking the sense of the Senate upon the point; but I do desire that the Senate shall dispose of the bill one way or the other. There is no necessity for recommitting it. When you come to compare it with the act granting a charter to the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company and the other railroad companies that have been incorporated by acts of Congress, the provisions of this bill are substantially the same provisions that were contained in each of those acts. I am not aware of the fact that any serious injury has resulted from the incorporation of those companies. I do not pretend to say, however, that there may not have been; I do not know; but I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill. I hope we shall amend the bill wherever amendment may seem to be desirable, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate to pass it, pass it; if not, reject it finally, and let us end it. There is no necessity for its recommittal.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, at the proper time when the bill comes back from the committee, if it is recommitted, or while it is before the Senate for amendment, I shall endeavor to amend the bill in the sixth section, line 7, where the provision is made that the company shall furnish commodious and comfortable cars for the use of the road, by inserting the following words:

And shall not permit more passengers to enter or ride therein than there are comfortable seats provided for, and any violation of this provision shall be a misdemeanor for which the company shall be punished by fine, not exceeding $50 for each offense; and the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to try such cases.

I know that we have not heretofore put such a provision in the charters of the street railroads here, but it ought to be everywhere provided, so that where a person enters a railroad car which only contains twelve seats, he should not be either required to give up his seat to persons who come in afterward or to crowd in upon those who first obtained the twelve seats thus provided. When a person pays his money, he ought to be provided with a comfortable seat. We all know that under the present system here they take on passengers just as long as one can hang on to the platform; and in rainy weather and at many seasons of the year it is extremely uncomfortable, growing out of the crowded condition of the cars. There is no comfort in them at such times. The cars may be ever so comfortable, the seats may be ever so comfortable; but the condition of them, growing out of the overcrowded number of passengers, makes it intolerable. There is no country in the world, I venture to say, except the United States, where street cars are allowed to take on more passengers than they have seats provided for, and Congress ought in granting new charters at least to require each company to whom it gives the privilege to furnish comfortable seats for the passengers whose money they take. I shall offer the amendment that I have indicated with the view of testing whether that shall be done in this case or not.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sure the Senator who has charge of this bill will gain time by having it recommitted. I do not think that this bill could be amended in a proper manner by the Senate in the various points that have been suggested where amendments are needful in less than one or two days.

Of course the Senator may be right in relation to this bill being a copy of some other acts upon the statute-book, but after the multiplicity of railroads that we have had it is time that we began to consider such acts with more scrutiny. I am sure the Senator would not wish that section 10, on page 6 of his amendment, should be adopted. It provides that the amount of capital may be "determined by said corporators." That would allow the corporation to start on five or ten dollars only subscribed, if they chose. The corporators are to determine that. Then they are allowed to issue bonds to the extent of $150,000, and then they are allowed, as the Senator from Kansas has stated, to unite with some other company hereafter if they choose. Under the circumstances I ask for the adoption of the resolution which I sent to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the recommital of the bill with instructions.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope, if the bill is to be committed at all, that it will be committed to a select committee. I would be very glad if the Senator from Vermont would make such a motion and let it go to a select committee, of which he would be chairman.

Mr. MORRILL. I should rather not.

Mr. HARRIS. But there is no necessity of sending it back to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL. It is only my deference to the Senator that keeps me from making a motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that motion being made. I simply desire that the Senate shall take action upon the measure. I have no particular desire that the bill shall pass or that it shall not pass.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 8.

Mr. MORRILL. As I see a division will perhaps result in showing that there is not a quorum present, I withdraw the motion, and will leave the question to be taken upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. ROLLINS. Let the instructions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The instructions will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Senate bill No. 532 be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing for an equitable tax on the gross receipts of the railway company therein provided for, and to provide for and fix the amount of capital, with the number of shares subscribed for prior to any organization of said company; to prohibit the use of steam thereon within the city of Washington, and to diminish the number of avenues and streets through which the said road may be authorized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. MORRILL. We had better have the yeas and nays, as a division is asked.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Blaine,	Hamlin,	Matthews,	Sargent,

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend by striking out, in line 10 of section 6, the words "propelled by steam or other approved motor power," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "drawn by horses."

Mr. HAMLIN. "Horses or other animals."

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Kansas certainly does not object to steam outside of the city limits?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. If I understand aright the amendment now pending, it requires the use of horse-power or animal power all over this road. I suggest to the mover of the amendment that he will scarcely want that if he understands as I do the route to be traversed by this road. I understand that it is to reach Bladensburgh, not on the Bladensburgh pike, not on any highway, but by running, as other steam railways run, through the fields where they obtain the right of way. Certainly the Senator does not want to employ animal power to draw cars through the country, miles out and distant from the highways of travel.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest that there cannot possibly be any objection to using steam from the point where F street crosses Nineteenth street, northeast, to Bladensburgh. If so, there is certainly objection to using steam on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas would require the use of horses over that part of the road from Nineteenth street, northeast, to Bladensburgh. Certainly he cannot mean that.

Mr. INGALLS. My understanding of the route prescribed by this bill is that, after it leaves the highways of the city, it follows the traveled roads principally leading to the Maryland State line.

Mr. ROLLINS. Not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. If it anywhere leaves the highways of the District and traverses fields, I should have no objection whatever, when it leaves a highway, to the horses being removed and an engine attached for the purpose of drawing the train through the fields.

Mr. ROLLINS. There certainly can be no possible objection, and if the Senator will take the trouble to examine the route, from the point to which I have referred to Bladensburgh, he will discover that there is no possible objection to the use of steam. It is a parallel route with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to a certain extent; and if there is objection in one case there certainly is the same objection in the other.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator's understanding of the route is different from mine.

Mr. ROLLINS. I have been over the route myself.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask my friend from Kansas whether it will not cover his point and also prevent the running of cars by steam within the city limits, to insert at the end of section 6 the following:

And provided further, That carriages shall not be propelled thereon otherwise than by horses within the city limits of Washington.

Mr. INGALLS. My amendment is to strike out the words in line 10.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to let those words remain in line 10 and to insert this proviso at the end of the section. It would prevent the use of anything but horses within the city limits.

Mr. ROLLINS. That would cover the suggestion I made to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is very objectionable to have steam-cars running by City Hall or through F street or through any avenues in Washington, especially if they are to have the smoke-stacks and other things described by the Senator from New York; but it is perfectly proper to allow them to use steam-cars outside of the city limits, across the fields, &c., along the route of this road, as I understand it.

Mr. ROLLINS. There would probably be no real objection to the use of the steam-car merely from the navy-yard to Bladensburgh. In that case this route passes over streets that are very sparsely settled. There are scarcely any houses upon the streets on which this road would run from the navy-yard to the jail, and thence to the junction of Nineteenth and F streets, northeast.

Mr. SARGENT. That is the condition of the street now, but we all know that street-cars build up houses all along their lines. Take Fourteenth street, which when the railroad track was laid down there had very few houses upon it, except near the center of the city. Now there are houses to the very verge, where it strikes the Fourteenth-street road at Boundary street.

Mr. ROLLINS. Possibly there may be some objection to it, but it was supposed by the committee that dummy-engines might be used in some portion of the city where the population was very sparse without injury to the convenience of the people. If it is the opinion of the Senate that any engine should not be used at all within the limits of the city, let the amendment of the Senator from Kansas be agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment offered by the Senator from California is entirely satisfactory to me, and I will withdraw the one I proposed.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I move, in line 18, at the end of section 6, to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That carriages shall not be propelled on said road—

I am not sure that "thereon" has an immediate antecedent—otherwise than by horses, within the city limits of Washington.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest "by horse-power."

Mr. SARGENT. No; "horses" would be better, because "horse-power" may relate to steam. The word "horses" is right.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, in section 10, line 5, by inserting after the words "capital stock" the words "as will amount to not less than $150,000, in shares of $50 each," and to strike out the words "of said company as shall be necessary." I think the Senator having charge of the bill will not object to that.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire in that connection why it is that the bill having required in the tenth section bona fide subscriptions of money to build and equip the road, in the eighteenth section authorizes borrowing and the mortgage of the road to the entire amount necessary for building and equipping it?

Mr. MORRILL. That section should be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it is the intention to strike out that section.

Mr. HARRIS. It is thought bona fide and solvent subscriptions sufficient to build the road may be subscribed, but the money may not be collected as rapidly as the work progresses. For that reason the corporators desire the permission and the privilege to make a loan for the purpose of constructing and equipping their road.

Mr. HOAR. For such a loan as that, certainly the authority to mortgage the road and the capital, provision for the payment of interest for the first two years in a certain way, and issuing coupons, is not necessary. If they have a solvent road with bona fide subscriptions of $150,000, they will have no difficulty in borrowing on the faith of the corporation such sum as may be necessary from time to time for the road. The bill at present contains two schemes for procuring the entire means necessary to build and equip the road. One is by mortgage, and the other is under the bill as it is now left. This road could do on its small scale what the Union Pacific Railroad did on its great scale, that is, it could divide in dividends the whole capital stock and then pledge the whole of the road upon a mortgage.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not myself see any evil in the section allowing the company to borrow money upon a mortgage of its property if it sees proper to do so; but, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to strike it out, I have no objection to its being done.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the eighteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be necessary now to amend the tenth section. Some other words must be stricken out. In lines 6 and 7 the words "the amount to be determined by said corporators" should be stricken out. Having fixed the amount, this is no longer necessary. I move to strike out the words "the amount to be determined by said corporators."

Mr. HARRIS. Striking out those words is now necessary.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course this amendment must follow what we have done.

Mr. HARRIS. It is necessary in view of the amendment that has been already made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I find that the amendment I suggested is not perhaps one that will meet the views of a number of gentlemen in the Senate and I shall not offer it.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator having charge of the bill that there is not sufficient provision here in relation to the subscription to the stock. Of course it will be in the power of any man to get any of his neighbors, children or minors of any sort, to subscribe for any amount of stock. If it were provided that they should not subscribe or hold stock, I think that would help it. Therefore I move to insert after the word "for" in line 14, of section 10, the words "or to hold;" so as to make the first proviso read:

That no person shall be permitted to subscribe for or to hold more than two hundred shares.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I further suggest to the Senator whether there ought not to be a provision that if this stock is not subscribed for the whole thing shall be abandoned and that the act shall cease to be operative.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a provision in the bill already that if the road is not completed within two years the charter shall be forfeited.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps that is sufficient.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is all provided for.

Mr. HARRIS. In section 15, line 7, after the word "offense," I move to strike out the words "the sum of $10" and insert "a fine not to exceed $500."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I was about to move to strike out all of the section after the word "railway," in the second line. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee does not meet fully the objection which I have to the section, which I will first proceed to read and then I will state my objection to it:

And if any person or persons shall willfully and wrongfully obstruct or impede the passage of, or destroy or injure the cars, depots, stations, or any other property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of $10 to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties are in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within ninety days after said offense shall have been committed.

It will be seen that the language of this section would cover every possible criminal offense that might be committed in destroying or injuring "the cars, depots, stations, or any other property belonging to said railway company." For instance, a railroad depot might be burned down, a car might be knocked to pieces or destroyed or burned on the track, and the penalty fixed is most ludicrously inadequate to such an offense as that; and yet it does seem to cover the whole ground of the criminal law so far as this class of injuries might be committed. I think it is much better to strike out the part of the section which I have read and leave this offense to the general law. If not, the whole section, I think, should be entirely remodeled and new penalties affixed.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I will say that this fifteenth section is a copy of similar sections in the charters of other street-railway corporations incorporated by Congress. But I have no objection to striking out as suggested from the word "railway" in the second line the rest of the section. That is the section to which I had moved an amendment to change the penalty from $10 to a fine of $500. Ten dollars is the penalty fixed in all other similar acts of incorporation in this city.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As the Senator consents to striking out the words, perhaps I ought not to say anything further; but the Senator will see and every Senator will see that $500 would be a very small penalty for burning down a depot.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that the section is liable to a constitutional difficulty. I suppose we cannot constitutionally provide a penalty for an offense against one man or one corporation which is not applicable to all others alike.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, that all after the word "railway" in line 2 of the fifteenth section be stricken out.

Mr. ROLLINS. That will remove the objection, surely.

Mr. HARRIS. The company will have under the general law remedies quite as full as this bill gives, or even fuller.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, striking out all after the word "railway" in the second line of the fifteenth section to the end of the section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I am informed by the Secretary that there was not a vote taken on the amendment that I proposed to add a proviso to the fourteenth section. I ask that the Secretary report it, and that the Senate take a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 14:

Provided, That said railway company shall be subject to such rules and regulations in operating said road as may be prescribed by the executive authority of the District of Columbia for the convenience and safety of the public.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend in the tenth section by inserting at the end of line 38 the following proviso:

Provided, That the stockholders shall be held personally liable to an amount equal to the par value of the stock held by them for any debts contracted by or for the company in case of default.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In section 10, beginning in line 25, there is a proviso the first clause of which reads:

That nothing shall be received in payment of the percentage as aforesaid but money.

I move to strike out in the twenty-sixth line the words "the percentage as aforesaid" and insert "said stock;" so as to read:

That nothing shall be received in payment of said stock but money.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In section 17, line 5, I move to strike out the words after "demanded" to the end of the section, being the words:

Or to comply with the general regulations of the company.

It will be seen that to leave it to the regulations of the company would be to completely nullify everything there is in the section, and that they might provide for any regulation. The Senator from Tennessee will see that they could make all sorts of general regulations.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In section 4, at the end of the section, in line 4, I move to insert:

But the same shall not be less than one-tenth of its gross receipts.

I think that ought to be adopted for all roads.

Mr. HARRIS. I would greatly prefer that that amendment should not be adopted as applied to this particular company. Unless the Senator will move a similar provision applicable to every street-railway company in the District of Columbia, I shall certainly object to this discrimination against one company. Make it apply to all and I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. ROLLINS. It would be hardly fair to tax this railway in the way proposed by the Senator from Vermont and leave the old and established routes here earning large dividends to escape this tax. If the Senator would move an amendment to include all the railroads in the city and serve them all alike, there would be justice in it.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 4: "but the same shall not be less than one-tenth of its gross receipts;" so as to make the section read:

The said railway and its branches shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real and personal property, shall be liable to taxation as other real and personal property, and to none other; but the same shall not be less than one-tenth of its gross receipts.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest that this matter be left to future legislation. If the Senator from Vermont desires action with reference to this subject let him submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, instructing that committee to report a bill taxing all the horse railroads in the city at least one-tenth of their gross receipts. It seems to me it would be much more fit and proper to do it in that way than in the way proposed by this amendment. If the Senator can move an amendment that will properly cover the subject, I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will withdraw that amendment and offer another amendment. At the end of section 21 I move to add the words "and may change the method and amount of taxation."

Mr. HARRIS. The section now reads:

That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

I think it includes the amendment already, and I have no objection to adding it.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there any doubt of the power? Does not the amendment imply a doubt of the power? Is there any doubt of the power really without the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Not a bit.

Mr. SARGENT. Not the slightest. It seems to me we are simply suggesting a doubt of our power.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to avoid any controversy in relation to the right.

Mr. SARGENT. There cannot be any controversy so far as taxation is concerned.

Mr. MORRILL. It might be well to reserve power to change the method of taxation.

Mr. HARRIS. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont because I think it wholly unnecessary and harmless; but it does nobody any good.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to it. I object to inserting the words moved, because I think to do so implies to the world that without this reservation we do not have the power, and if we should want to deal with the other railroad companies in regard to which we have no such reservation, then it would be an argument against our power.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I agree with the Senator from California that it would be harmful to put these words in, as it would imply a doubt of our power.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Section 14 is as follows:

That all persons exercising municipal authority in said District, the officers or agents of any body-corporate within said District, are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railway herein authorized.

The question arose in my mind as to whether, if these parties were not proceeding in a proper manner, this section would not prohibit the taking of legal proceedings to prevent their doing acts that they ought not to do. I suggest, after the word "any," in line 3, before the word "act," to insert the word "unlawful;" so as to read:

Are hereby prohibited from doing any unlawful act or thing to hinder, &c.

I am not sure that the amendment is necessary, but out of abundant caution I think we had better not give these parties liberty to to do everything and have no power whatever to check them.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the amendment at all necessary. It does not change the sense of the section, in my opinion, in the slightest degree, and I have no objection to the Senator incorporating the words he suggests.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As the section now stands it seems to prohibit any act to prevent this company from going on and constructing this road. It might become the duty of the authorities of this city, or of the agents of some other railroad that they cross, to take legal proceedings to prevent them from doing a thing in an improper manner. It strikes me that the language here would prohibit such legal proceedings being taken. I therefore propose simply to insert the word "unlawful," so as to read that they are hereby prohibited "from doing any unlawful act or thing." I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it is necessary, but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I really would not put that in. Everybody is prohibited from doing an unlawful act. Specify what acts they are.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not sure but that under the very language of this section these corporators may do just what they please.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the Secretary read the whole section as it would read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed, the section would read:

That all persons exercising municipal authority in said District, the officers or agents of any body-corporate within said District, are hereby prohibited from doing any unlawful act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railway herein authorized.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the committee will consent to strike out that section altogether.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I propose to insert this word out of abundant caution because it is very broad language.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not think there is any necessity for the fourteenth section.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment which was attached to that section as an addition be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The following proviso was added to the fourteenth section:

Provided, That said railway company shall be subject to such rules and regulations in operating said road as may be prescribed by the executive authority of the District of Columbia for the convenience and safety of the public.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that the amendment which has just been read will be adopted as a substitute for section 14, and that the original text of the section will be stricken out altogether. Certainly it would be very unnecessary for Congress to put in a law that nobody should do any unlawful thing. Such acts are prohibited, of course, by the law of the land.

Mr. SARGENT. The word "unlawful" has been inserted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that they would be prohibited except for the very peculiar language of the section, which seems to be an unbridled license to this company to do anything, and that nobody shall interfere with them. Now, where is the provision, after you insert such broad language, which would justify a railroad company that they may cross in interfering with this company if it should tear up their road or interfere with the other company in any particular manner in order to construct their road? I know it is unlawful to do unlawful acts, of course, as a general rule; but here you grant a charter in which you give a company an express privilege of doing as they please, and prohibit anybody from interfering with them. I am not sure that the amendment is necessary, but if in the judgment of other Senators the word "unlawful" is not necessary I am perfectly willing it should be stricken out, for I have no interest in any company here to protect. I think I shall vote against the whole proposition to construct this railroad.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware I think misunderstood

my suggestion, because it is entirely in concurrence with what seems to be his opinion. My suggestion is that the whole section as it is in the text be stricken out. If this company in undertaking to construct their road do anything which makes it the duty of a municipal officer of this District or the duty of an agent or officer of any corporation to resist them, it is their right and their duty to do it within legal limits. Of course the officers of every corporation must defend their own legal rights, and the law which permits them makes it their duty to defend their own legal rights; and the law enjoins them already from doing anything unlawful. So my point is that it is undignified and in bad taste to have any such section in the bill at all, and that the whole section should be stricken out which prohibits other people from interfering with this road; and this I understand is in accordance with the view of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a better proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. The fourteenth section did not escape my attention in examining the bill. I confess that I did not at the time very clearly see, as I do not at this time very clearly see, the absolute necessity for such a section; but finding in every railroad charter that has been granted by Congress within the District of Columbia the identical section, word for word, I did not deem it necessary to strike it out. But, as I said before, I could not see at the time, as I do not clearly see now, any absolute necessity for retaining it. I did add, however what has been read, giving to the authorities of the District of Columbia the power to prescribe such rules and regulations for the operation of the road as may be necessary for the convenience and safety of the public.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee, then, that he move the clause which he has just read as a substitution for the present section 14; that is, to strike out the section as it stands in the text and insert his addition.

Mr. HARRIS. I find this section in every other railroad charter here. I do not see that it is harmful at all. I do not see that it is particularly necessary. I shall be content with any action the Senate shall take in regard to the section; but I do not see proper myself to move to strike it out.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is safe to say that you cannot find worse legislative precedents anywhere in this country than can be found in the charters which have been granted by Congress for railroads in the Territories or in this District or anywhere else. We have granted charters to roads which are to be of the length of five hundred or a thousand miles, crossing Territories which are to be made mighty States, leaving out all the safeguards which the experience of the older and better settled portions of the country has shown are absolutely necessary to protect the public against frauds or against oppression by those mighty corporations in the future. A railroad charter ought to be prepared with the care with which you would draft the constitution of a State almost, and although of course that is not true in regard to a little street-railway system, yet it is true that the same gross carelessness has prevailed in regard to both.

Mr. HARRIS. I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts if he moves to strike out the fourteenth section, that his motion be to strike out the original section; and, if it shall be stricken out, then the amendment that I added to the fourteenth section would come in better after the fifteenth section, as that section stands now amended.

Mr. HOAR. I make the motion to strike out the fourteenth section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. Has the fourteenth section been amended?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, there is an addendum to it.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that it may be read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section, as amended, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That all persons exercising municipal authority in said District, the officers or agents of any body-corporate within said District, are hereby prohibited from doing any unlawful act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railway herein authorized: Provided, That said railway company shall be subject to such rules and regulations in operating said road as may be prescribed by the executive authority of the District of Columbia for the convenience and safety of the public.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no sanction to this section. Suppose that these persons do something that will hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of the road, where is the penalty? There is no penalty provided here, and they are no more prohibited by these words than they are by the general law. They have no right now to do anything to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of a railway that Congress has authorized. The addendum, however, that has been put on seems to give affirmatively to the commissioners of the District some supervision over the matter. The whole essence of the thing is in that amendment. I ask that that be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said railway company shall be subject to such rules and regulations in operating said road as may be prescribed by the executive authority of the District of Columbia for the convenience and safety of the public.

Mr. THURMAN. "The executive authority of the District of Columbia." That is rather an obscure term, is it not?

Mr. HOAR. I understand that amendment is not yet pending, and that the present amendment is simply to strike out section 14 as it now stands. The Senator from Tennessee proposed to move the language to which the Senator from Ohio alludes at a later period.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought that had been adopted.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. It seems to me that there is no sanction provided to this fourteenth section, and that the law would be precisely the same without the section as with it, and it may as well be stricken out.

Mr. ROLLINS. I understand that the proviso has been adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment to the fourteenth section was adopted; but I understand the Senator from Massachusetts now to move to strike out all of the fourteenth section except that part contained in the amendment. If that motion shall prevail, then I ask to add the proviso to the fifteenth section instead of the fourteenth.

Mr. MORRILL. All that can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the transposition will be made, and section 14 considered stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I desire to inquire whether "six miles," in line 3 of section 19, has been changed. If not, it ought to be changed, because the danger of running six miles instead of four would be very great. I inquire whether the word "six" has been changed or not.

Mr. HARRIS. It has not been.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to strike out "six" and insert "four."

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will not insist on that motion. We have so amended the bill as to provide for the use of horse-power within the city of Washington and steam-power outside the city limits.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I will withdraw that amendment. I have one more amendment, however, to offer. I move to strike out section 8. Surely we do not want to go into a partnership for building cars and vans with this railroad company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out section 8.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the section be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. In consideration of the concessions of the right of way through the streets and avenues of the city of Washington, as heretofore mentioned, by the Government of the United States, it shall be obligatory upon the said railroad company, upon the completion of the F street branch aforesaid, to place upon said track such prison van or vans as the Government shall provide, for the purpose of transmitting, from time to time, as the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall order and direct, all prisoners held in custody in the jail of the District of Columbia to the City Hall and returning the same to said jail, for which service the said railway company shall be entitled to such compensation annually as shall be reasonable and just, to be paid as other expenses of the supreme court of the District of Columbia are paid.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say that, if this shall be found to be a desirable thing to do, it can be done whether this provision is in the bill or not; but as it stands now it looks like a consideration given by the railroad company for the whole concession of the right of way through the streets. Besides, it is obligatory upon the railway company that they shall do all this; and then the mode and manner of compensating the service I think is objectionable. I cannot think there will be any objection to the striking out of the whole section.

Mr. ROLLINS. This does not compel the Government to do anything; it compels the railroad to do certain things if the Government desires the railroad to do them. That is all.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is proper that the section should be retained, because it only secures to the Government the right to put the vans on the road if it sees proper to do so, and under this section the railroad company is compelled to run them under the orders of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Strike it out, and it leaves the company free to contract with the Government or not, as it may please or as may be agreed upon. I can see no evil to come from it; and it secures to the Government the right to put the vans on the road and have the prisoners transported from the court-house to the jail and from the jail to the court-house according to the convenience and wishes of the court.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the objection to the section is that it contains a recital that this right of way is something that the railroad company buys and pays for. That is the objection to it. It grants them this right of way, not to be held at the mere legislative discretion of Congress simply and alone, but it declares that by a certain contract on its part "in consideration of the concessions of the right of way through the streets and avenues of the city of Washington heretofore mentioned, by the Government of the United States." Now, in the exercise of our power to amend or repeal this charter hereafter, it is a very different thing to deal with a corporation that has got its rights by the bounty of the Government or merely in consideration of the sense of Congress of a public emergency, and to deal with a corporation whose act of incorporation recites that it bought and paid for the privileges conferred. It seems to me that is the objection to this section.

Mr. HARRIS. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he entertains a shadow of doubt that under section 21, notwithstanding the recitation contained in section 8, Congress would have full power to alter, amend, or repeal this charter at any time in its discretion if it saw fit to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not. Where, then, is the evil in that respect?

Mr. HOAR. The evil is that when we are asked to exercise the power to repeal this charter ten years or twenty years hence, it turns out to be a great burden on the public, some new method of transporting passengers is invented, and this railroad holds on to its old rights in the streets of Washington, Congress is asked to repeal it; it has got the power undoubtedly; but it is one thing to take away with the exercise of that power a voluntary boon, conferred by Congress, from the corporation, and quite another thing to exercise the power when the charter recites that it was bought and paid for. It strikes me that the best way would be to strike out the first five or six lines of this section down to "the United States." I see no difficulty in that.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to striking out the first, second, third, and fourth lines to the word "the," and inserting before the word "the" "it shall be the duty of;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of said railroad company, upon the completion of the F street branch aforesaid, to place on said track such prison van or vans," &c.

That meets the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts, and leaves all that there was in the section that was material to be retained.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I proposed to suggest when I originally rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Now let me suggest another thing. The Government are to furnish the vans and therefore the fare ought not to be as much as it would cost to get a hack to carry every passenger there, as might be charged. I suggest to the Senator to insert on line 13, after the words "such compensation annually as shall be reasonable and just," the words "not exceeding double the regular fare."

Mr. HARRIS. Do you mean the regular fare for each person? I think that amendment would be harmful. I cannot conceive the possibility of their charging, the Government furnishing the vans, even the ordinary fare, and the Senator putting in "not exceeding double the ordinary fare" is suggestive of unreasonable demands. I think the section is very much better without the amendment, and I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont propose an amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; not if the Senator objects.

Mr. BECK. I shall offer a portion of the amendment which I suggested. In section 6, line 7, after the word "road," I move to insert:

And shall not permit more passengers to ride thereon than there are comfortable seats provided.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see that it is any disadvantage to the corporation to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; but it would certainly be a very great hardship upon my friend from Kentucky to compel him to stand along that roadside waiting for a car when he would greatly prefer entering and standing up every foot of the way he had to go than to wait until another car came along. Under his amendment it would be the duty of the conductor of the car to say to him "You shall not enter at all; you shall remain here or walk." It would be a great inconvenience; and for that reason I object to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say in response, that if I happened to be one of the twelve, fifteen, or twenty persons for whom seats were provided and who were already in the car, there are a great many persons in the District, that I could name, whom I would not want to have crowding in on me by the dozen, so that my seat would not be a comfortable one after I had paid my money. If this company is to furnish, and it is required to have, commodious and comfortable cars, surely it ought to make them comfortable to passengers who do pay their money and provide seats for them. If the company furnish insufficient cars for the accommodation of the traveling public or refuse to furnish comfortable seats when cars are provided, I suppose Congress has power to require them to perform their duty.

There is a limit to the capacity of cars of course; and whether it should be the seating capacity or the hanging-on capacity, is the question that this amendment of mine determines. If I am standing on the road-side, as the Senator from Tennessee suggests, there may be so many people hanging on in the car that I would have to walk anyhow; and therefore the question is only whether I shall intrude myself into a place where there are twelve, fourteen, or twenty persons, as many as there are seats for, and make that whole number uncomfortable, and whether others shall do the same thing, or wait till another car comes. There is a limit somewhere; and it is either the seating capacity of the cars or the hanging-on and crowded capacity. Whether it is better for the railroad company or not, there ought to be some rule about it to secure to the comfort of the public and to consider the capacity of the horses that they employ. Beasts of burden are to be consulted too, and a limit ought to be fixed somewhere, and I think it ought to be the seating capacity of the car.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment is perhaps just toward the traveling public in one sense, and yet it is evident that the corporation has some rights that ought to be respected. If you propose to compel them to carry only such number of passengers as can be comfortably seated, they should be protected against the invasion of persons who have no right to enter the cars. I therefore hope the Senator from Kentucky will accept the following amendment to his amendment:

And any person attempting to enter a car when the seats are occupied shall be subject to fine and imprisonment.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; that will not do.

Mr. INGALLS. The corporation must be protected from the invasion of persons who have no right to enter the car.

Mr. BECK. They have the same power to furnish seats as they have to furnish places for people to hang on.

Mr. KERNAN. I think, instead of making people at their peril subject to fine and imprisonment, we had better leave it to the conductor to regulate who shall come in when the cars are full.

Mr. ROLLINS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is certainly entirely impracticable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the committee's amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 12; as follows:

PORT OF BATH, MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up House bill No 3123. I am sure it will not occupy two minutes of the time of the Senate, and it is important that it should be passed.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3123) extending the privileges of section 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive, to the port of Bath, in the State of Maine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. What are the privileges referred to?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state. The first section of the Revised Statutes named in the bill, section 2990, names certain ports into which goods may be entered and bonded for re-exportation to other ports; and we have extended those other ports in numerous cases. The other six sections referred to provide the mode and manner of taking the goods from the port in which they are bonded, and exporting them to other ports named. This is simply extending those rights to the port of Bath. We have extended them to very many other ports since the Revised Statutes were passed. The bill is eminently proper and meets the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce, and it is a bill which has been passed in the other branch.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise to call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana demands the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say that as no Senator is prepared to address the Senate on the subject this afternoon I will have the bill laid aside informally for the purpose of enab ing the chairman of the Pension Committee, the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] to have the Senate go to the Calendar of pension business, which is very important and necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the regular order informally for the purpose indicated?

Mr. MORRILL. I merely rise to take the floor on the bill when it comes up on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none.

LOUISA J. GUTHRIE AND OTHERS.

It further proposes to place on the pension-roll the names of Ellen Saxton, widow of the late James Saxton; Celia Bell, widow of the late Stephen Bell; and Roxanna Walker, widow of the late Willis Walker, all of whose late husbands volunteered to assist the late Captain John Julius Guthrie, and were drowned while attempting to render assistance to the crew of the Huron, at the rate provided by law for the widows of deceased seamen in the United States Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. INGALLS. There is. These are the widows of those brave men who endeavored to rescue the officers and crew at the time of the wreck of the Huron on the coast of North Carolina. There is a report, which can be read if the Senator desires it.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN IOWA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 877. I do not think it will take long.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 877) providing the times and places of holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Iowa and the appointment of an additional judge in said district was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, this bill involves two distinct questions. One is the distribution of circuit-court powers to the different parts of the State and the other is the appointment of an additional judge for the district. Both of these things are, in the opinion of the Judiciary Committee, necessary. Iowa is a very large State, perhaps three hundred and forty miles long by three hundred broad. It is permeated with railroads, four trunk lines of railroad extending east and west. There are fifty-five thousand square miles, a population of a million and a half, and there is but one place for the holding of the circuit court in the State, and that is at Des Moines. There are three other places for holding district courts, and the committee thought it eminently proper that circuit courts should be held in those other places. Whether they would have advised at this time, if there had not been three other places where district courts were held, that there should be so many places of holding the circuit court might be doubtful; but inasmuch as courts are already established at those places the committee thought proper to give them circuit-court powers. It lessens the expense of witnesses and jurors, the State being so very large, and accommodates suitors and counsel. I do not suppose there will be very much objection to that provision.

There are already eighteen States in which there are two or more places for holding the circuit court and fourteen or fifteen States in which the district court has circuit-court powers.

With the increasing business of the State the Judiciary Committee thought it eminently proper that the distribution of power should be extended to those other places in which the district courts are held.

The main question is about the appointment of an additional judge. The committee became satisfied that the business of the State required an increase of judicial force. How to do this was the question. To divide the district into two, as is done in most States, would involve additional expense, would require the appointment of marshals and attorneys, and greatly add to the Federal expenses in the State. They thought that inasmuch as a judge was necessary it was better simply to add to the force by requiring the appointment of an additional district judge. There is a precedent for that, although it has not been commonly done. A State has been usually divided into districts, and yet there is no constitutional objection to having more than one district judge in a district, and it is eminently proper that it should be so. In 1812 in New York an additional judge was appointed for the district of New York; the two judges presided at the courts there; and in 1814 the State was divided into two districts, northern and southern, and one judge was transferred to the northern district and one to the southern district.

Now a word as to the business in Iowa. One learns a great deal by the amount of judgments rendered in the Federal courts in a State, and I think the Senate will be astonished when they learn, as I see from the report of the Attorney-General of the United States, that judgments other than judgments in behalf of the United States were rendered in the State of Iowa for the four years ending July 1, 1877, to the amount of $20,446,350, and that in but one State, and that is my own, was there any greater amount of judgments rendered than in Iowa. There were rendered in the State of Illinois judgments to the amount of over $37,000,000; in the State of Michigan, over $12,000,000; in Minnesota, $6,000,000; in Nebraska, $6,000,000, and so on, whereas in Kentucky it was but $243,000. That was the total amount of the judgments rendered in Federal courts for four years in Kentucky up to July 1, 1877. So in the Eastern States the same comparison would hold good. How is this accounted for? It grows out of the fact that the Western States are debtor States to the East, and the creditors seek the Federal courts instead of the State courts, as furnishing quicker and better facilities for obtaining justice. That is solely the reason.

This large amount of business that has been done in Iowa involved, of course, very heavy Federal expenses. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, the total expenses in Iowa were $77,000. I leave off the odd numbers, there being only three States where the expenditures were greater, New York, Arkansas, and North Carolina. I do not know how it happened in North Carolina and Arkansas, but that is immaterial. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, these expenses were increased to $97,000, there being but three States where the expenditures were greater, New York, North Carolina, and Arkansas. So in 1876 and 1877. In 1877 there were but four States and in 1876 but three States where the expenditures were greater.

There were also rendered in Iowa a large number of judgments in which the United States were plaintiffs, and the amount of judgments was greater in Iowa than in the following States, all of which have the advantage of two districts, namely, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Michigan, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, Virginia, and Wisconsin. Every one of these States where there are two or more districts had less judgments rendered in behalf of the United States than were rendered in Iowa.

The State is constantly increasing in population. There is no great center of wealth where insurance companies naturally grow up, and therefore most of the insurance business of the State is done by foreign companies; and the railroads are owned abroad, and nearly all the litigation that burdens the Federal courts there grows out of controversies between foreign corporations and the citizens there.

This State is in the judicial circuit of Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, and Judge Dillon is the circuit judge. They both bear testimony to the ability of the district judge and to his great experience and industry, and yet they say——

Mr. MAXEY. I will say to the Senator that we cannot hear him. Does the bill increase the number of Federal judges in Iowa?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. One judge, a district judge, is added, not a circuit judge. Judge Dillon says:

> With the utmost efforts of the judges in Iowa, sitting separately and giving the courts all their available time, they have not been able for some years to clear the dockets or keep down arrearages. The number of the causes is constantly increasing. There are about six hundred causes on the docket of the circuit court.

This letter was written in March last.

> The appointment of another district judge would, in my opinion, give the necessary relief and satisfy the bar, who feel a deep interest in having the present condition of things remedied.

Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, testifies to the same effect in a letter written about the same period, and so does the district judge of the State.

The Judiciary Committee watches these matters very carefully and is very desirous of getting along as well as we possibly can without increasing the judicial force, but I believe in this case it is absolutely essential.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say that if the Senate is to go into this business of increasing the number of Federal judges, it may be very proper to continue it. I think every substantial reason given by the Senator from Illinois why an additional judge should be appointed for the State of Iowa would apply with full force to my own State. Georgia is a larger State territorially than Iowa. She has fifty-eight thousand square miles, according to my recollection, and the State of Iowa has less than that. It is intersected by railroads I suppose as completely as Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me I will state that we take up cases that are before us. There has been no request that we should now consider any other case than this. There are other bills before us. Let each bill stand on its own merits. Two more have been reported this week and some will doubtless be reported hereafter; but there has been no request that the Judiciary Committee should consider the State of Georgia with reference to its want of judicial force. If the Senator wishes to bring that subject up by the introduction of a bill or petition, the committee will consider it.

Mr. HILL. I was going to say that there is a large demand in Georgia for an additional judge. The business is very burdensome; so the judges say. They are very laborious men and very able men, both the district judge and the circuit judge. The State is already divided into two districts. It has a population as large as Iowa, about a million and a half. I suppose the amount of the judgments in Georgia in the Federal courts is not as great as in Iowa; that is, the aggregate is not as large, because we are a poorer people than the people of the rich State of my friend from Iowa; but I expect the number of cases tried in Georgia exceeds the number tried in Iowa and I expect the courts are quite as crowded. I have thought on several occasions of suggesting that we have an additional district judge at least in Georgia, but I have not brought forward the measure because I found on investigation that quite a number of other States would be just as well entitled to an additional judge as my own, and as the others were not moving I felt a delicacy in moving myself. I did not know until to-day that a proposition had been brought forward to increase the number of judges in the State of Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do hope the Senator will not antagonize his case with this bill or anything else which the committee has not investigated.

Mr. HILL. I am not going to do it. I am not going to propose to insert "Georgia" in this bill and my friend need not be uneasy on that subject. I am not going to propose to insert Georgia in this bill, but I am going to notify the Senate that I have had a hesitation myself in agreeing to an increase of the number of Federal judges in any of the States. I have had great hope that we should soon see the Federal court business in the several States greatly decreased. It seems to me it has been increasing wonderfully for some years, but I have been in hopes that it would begin soon to decrease, and that we should not be brought to the necessity of having additional judges.

I have a strong inclination myself to oppose the increase of the Federal judges unless a case of absolute necessity is made for it. All I have to say now is that, if the Senate under the statements made by the Senator from Illinois shall conclude that an additional judge ought to be appointed for the State of Iowa, I hope when the proposition shall be brought forward to give us an additional judge also in the State of Georgia the Senate will not go back upon its own record. If it is to be the rule that additional judges are to be appointed, let them be appointed for each State where the demand is equally great. As I say, I have been inclined myself not to move in this matter; I have not put in a bill for Georgia, and preferred not to do it because as I say other States are as well entitled to an additional judge as my own. Iowa is certainly no better entitled.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. For what purpose is the Senator making this argument if he does not wish to include Georgia? I stated as one reason why Iowa was entitled to an increase of judicial force more than any State in this country, except Illinois, that there were $20,000,000 of judgments rendered there in four years. There were but $5,000,000 in Georgia in the same length of time.

Mr. HILL. To be sure, the amount is larger because we are a poorer people, but I expect the number of cases tried is greater in Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It cannot be much greater.

Mr. HILL. Some cases may involve $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 at once, and it may take five hundred causes to make up the same amount in another State. Twenty million dollars would be an immense sum in Georgia; and $5,000,000 is a larger sum in Georgia, I expect, than $20,000,000 is in Iowa; but the number of cases is as great, I think greater. Now, without having made the comparison, I rather suspect if the Senator will make the comparison he will find, counting the cases, that there are quite as many cases in Georgia as in Iowa, and the labor of the judges is very heavy.

Now, I want to say to the Senate that if it is the will of the Senate to enter upon this business of increasing the Federal judges in the different States, be it so. I do not say that I will antagonize the movement very strongly, but I desire frankly to give notice to the Senate that if we are to have an increase in other States equality should be the law, and if any other State has as strong a right to an increase of judges I hope the Senate will remember that I have said this.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will remember everything you have said.

Mr. HILL. Now I say to the Senator from Illinois frankly that the real point of my remark is an inclination to oppose his bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I guessed so; but the Senator is a long time getting it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. And yet I confess I intended not to oppose it, because, if the bill passes, the Senate will have to do something for my State. We want a judge in my State too.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. HILL. I am afraid this increase of judges is all evil. That is exactly the trouble with it. If I were satisfied it was not evil I would go for my friend's bill.

However, having served the Senate with due notice that we want equal favors and equal privileges in this country, if the Senate shall agree to give Iowa an additional judge, I hope the Senate will not object to giving Georgia in due time an additional district judge also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary is, in line 6 of section 1, after the word "district," to insert:

> And one grand and one petit jury shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts at each term thereof.

And to strike out in lines 8 and 9 the words:

> But the circuit judge shall not be required to sit in said court except at Des Moines;

So as to read:

> That the circuit court of the United States in and for the district of Iowa shall hereafter be held at the times and places provided by law for holding the United States district court in and for said district; and one grand and one petit jury shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts at each term thereof.

Mr. WALLACE. I rise simply to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this places the United States judiciary in the State of Iowa with its three judges on the same footing with the State of Pennsylvania with its four million and a half people and but three judges. We have but one circuit judge and two district judges, so that a million and a half of people in Iowa are placed on the same footing that we are in the State of Pennsylvania. We are moving already in the House in regard to an additional judge, an additional district in that State. The business requires it.

This is all I have to say, because I do not intend to antagonize the report of the Judiciary Committee on this subject, but I wish to call the attention of the Appropriation Committee to this point.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The circuit judge in Pennsylvania has simply Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Delaware to attend to; and there is more business in one of the districts in which Judge Dillon holds court in Missouri than there is in all three of those States, as can be proved by the report of the Attorney-General. This is simply an additional district judge. The circuit judge of the western circuit has Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, and Nebraska in his circuit. The object of this additional district judge is to hold a circuit court. It is impossible for the regular circuit judge to hold the courts in these different States.

Mr. WALLACE. I presume if Judge McKennan were heard on this subject, or if those who practice before him were heard by the committee, the same result would be found in that circuit, for the immense commercial business of the city of Philadelphia as well as that of the State of New Jersey and western Pennsylvania and what there may be of Delaware comes before him. But I do not desire, as I said before, to antagonize this bill. I only desire to call attention to the fact that four and a half million people there are placed on the same footing as this million and a half.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator ought to bear in mind that the territory over which the circuit judge in the western circuit we are speaking of is obliged to go is a territory of thousands of miles; and he ought also to bear in mind that in Judge McKennan's circuit there are the eastern district judge of Pennsylvania and the western district judge of Pennsylvania and the district judge of Delaware and so on, whereas in this great State of Iowa, which is three hundred miles long east and west and two hundred miles north and south, as well as in these other great States there is only one judge to a State; so that the territorial space is a large element which has to be considered in such a question.

Mr. WALLACE. I presume the power of a judge to travel has something to do with it, because it requires a certain amount of physical ability.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It takes time also.

Mr. WALLACE. As I have already said, I do not desire to antagonize this bill, but I want to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact which exists, that the district courts in my State have been compelled to adjourn for want of the necessary amount of money to carry on the district courts in that State.

Mr. SARGENT. That is so all over the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That has been so in Illinois and everywhere else.

Mr. WALLACE. If it be a fact, it is a disgraceful one, and one that the Senate ought to apply a remedy to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Attention was called to that at the last session by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. On the second page, line 13 of section 1, the words "or the court, for good cause, shall otherwise order" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will first be on the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. The first amendment of the committee has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 14 of section 1, after the word "all," to strike out "appeals or writs of error allowed by law from the district court to the circuit court of Iowa" and insert "causes which may be removed from the district to the circuit court, either by appeal or a writ of error," and after the word "Des Moines," in line 18, to strike out:

To be heard by said court when held by one or more circuit judges: And provided further, That the judge of said district court may, in his discretion, order that the same jurors be summoned to serve in both said courts at any term thereof, such order to be made and entered of record at least thirty days prior to such term.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all causes which may be removed from the district to the circuit court, either by appeal or a writ of error, shall be taken to the circuit court at Des Moines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 2, after the word "additional" to insert "district," and after the word "Iowa," in line 3, to insert "who shall have the same salary as the present judge of said district;" so as to read:

The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional district judge in and for the district of Iowa, who shall have the same salary as the present judge of said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of section 2, to insert:

But the district judge oldest in commission shall have the right to appoint the clerks of all district courts, and shall, from time to time, designate what court shall be held by the junior district judge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. On line 13 of section 1, I move to strike out the words "or the court, for good cause, shall otherwise order." It would seem as if the State court should order the case to one or the other of the circuit courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MAXEY. I only desire to say that the well-considered statement of the Senator from Illinois satisfies me that the bill ought to pass. I have been advised by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that a bill in which I have very great interest on behalf of my State is pending before a subcommittee of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois is a member. I desire to call his attention to that now because I believe that everything which he has stated in regard to Iowa is equally true of the bill which he has under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman not to vote for this bill under any idea of what we shall do with the other bill, because I do not want any votes in that way. Each thing must stand on its own bottom, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARRIS. I only have to say this: if the Committee on the Judiciary of this body has carefully considered, as I doubt not it has, the question of the propriety of creating this additional judicial officer to the judicial force in Iowa, for one I am content to vote upon their recommendation, and I shall vote for the passage of the bill. I too have a bill before that committee, asking for an additional district judge, and I simply ask that committee to look to the condition of things in Tennessee, and if they find upon the facts that it is necessary, as I believe it is, they will report in favor of it, and if they do not I shall cheerfully acquiesce in such conclusions as they may arrive at.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill as I shall vote against all bills coming from any committee of the Senate, however distinguished that committee may be, which increase the number of the Federal judiciary or their jurisdiction. We have now too many Federal courts and they have too great jurisdiction. The repeal of the bankrupt law will take from the Federal courts one-third of the cases pending in them, and when other laws which ought to be repealed shall have been repealed the courts already existing will be more than sufficient to attend to all legitimate business which will be pending before them. The bankrupt act multiplied the business of the United States courts to a very great extent. The repeal of that act will take an immense amount of litigation from those courts; and when that business is taken from them, those that we now have will be amply able to properly attend to all the business before those courts. And now upon the final passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allison,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Conover,	Kellogg,	Plumb,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Sargent,

NAYS—12.

Bayard,	Eaton,	McCreery,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—30.

So the bill was passed.

FISHERY-COMMISSION AWARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit for your appropriate action a communication from the Secretary of State on the subject of the result of the deliberations of the fishery commission, appointed under certain provisions of the treaty of Washington, with the accompanying documents.

Article 22 of the treaty provides that any sum of money which the commissioners may award shall be paid by the United States Government, in a gross sum, within twelve months after such award shall have been given.

The commission announced the result of its deliberations on the 23d day of November, last year, and an appropriation at the present session of Congress will be necessary to enable the Government to make the payment provided for in the treaty.

I respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress the record of the transaction as presented upon the papers, and recommend an appropriation of the necessary sum with such discretion to the Executive Government in regard to its payment as in the wisdom of Congress the public interests may seem to require.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 17, 1878.

MARRIAGE OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator from California to yield to me a moment to call up a bill that it will not take more than three minutes to pass.

Mr. SARGENT. If it will only occupy three minutes, I will yield.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 1028.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1028) declaratory of the law relating to descents and inheritance in the District of Columbia in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not care to say a word except to have the bill read.

The bill was read. It provides that the issue of any marriage of colored persons, contracted and entered into according to any custom prevailing at the time in any of the States wherein the same occurred, shall, for all purposes of descent and inheritance of property within the District of Columbia, be deemed and held to be legitimate, and capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance from and to their parents, or either of them, and from and to those from whom such parents, or either of them, may inherit or transmit inheritance, anything in the laws of such State to the contrary notwithstanding. Nothing herein is to be construed as implying that any such marriage is not valid or such issue legitimate for all other purposes.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 6, after the word "inheritance," to strike out the word "of" and insert "and the transmission of both real and personal."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear this bill explained.

Mr. HOAR. That will take more than three minutes.

Mr. MERRIMON. Doubts have arisen as to whether colored people who are the offspring of parents married when they were slaves under the customs of the States where they lived and were married can inherit. The object of this bill is simply to cure any defect of that sort, so as to put it beyond question that they can inherit. A case was brought to the attention of the committee which illustrated very fully the necessity for some legislation of this sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in line 9, after the word "inheritance," to insert: "and taking as next of kin and distributee according to law;" so as to read:

Be deemed and held to be legitimate, and capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance, and taking as next of kin and distributee according to law, from and to their parents, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that the phraseology of the proviso at the end of the bill in its last clause is open to two constructions. One of them is that it might be understood to mean that nothing in this act shall be construed as intimating that such a marriage is legitimate and regular. I know that is not the intention, but as it is phrased, it is open to a little question.

Mr. MERRIMON. The proviso at the end was intended to cut off any possible implication that any marriage that existed of the character described in the bill, before the passage of the bill, was not valid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand its purpose, and it is a good one. But my criticism——

Mr. MERRIMON. This is to make the right as broad as possible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My criticism was that the phraseology is such that the last clause of the proviso might bear exactly the opposite construction, that the bill should not be taken as implying that the marriage was legitimate.

Mr. MERRIMON. It did not impress me so. If the Senator can suggest a modification, I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The thing is so sudden that I cannot suggest one at this moment.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to this inquiry, which I should like to put, whether, in case there should have been more than one of these unions in a state of slavery successive to each other, and where the prior union was not dissolved by death, it is the intention of this bill to legitimize the issue of all such unions, or only the first one?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know that that question was considered at all; I do not think it was. I suppose that is a possible case.

I said to the Senator from California that I did not think this bill would occupy three minutes. I feel bound to consent, if he insists on it, that its further consideration shall be postponed. I only want the bill to pass. It is interesting now to have it passed.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator sits down, I should like to ask one question, because if the bill goes over he may like to think of it, and that is whether the bill ought not at least to be limited to marriages heretofore contracted. This is a bill which gives effect, so far as inheritance in this District is concerned, to marriages according to the custom of colored persons, although they are entirely illegal as marriages in the State where they were contracted, and gives effect not only as regards the children and parents, but all collateral inheritances of every kind. Now, my question is whether that ought not to be limited to the past, whether anybody desires to perpetuate hereafter, the colored people being all free and on terms of equality with the white people, a provision by which they may contract marriages by customs of their own in violation of the laws of the State where they live.

Mr. MERRIMON. The tenor of the bill shows that it is applicable only to the past. By possibility such a state of things cannot exist again.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is clearly applicable to the future.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall have to insist on my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is unfinished business and will be the first thing in order on Monday.

Mr. SARGENT. Now the Senator from Missouri wishes to make an announcement, I understand.

JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to announce to the Senate that on Monday morning, as soon as the morning business is through, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. INGALLS. I gave notice yesterday that on Monday I would call the attention of the Senate to the bill for the permanent government of the District of Columbia. I shall feel called upon to antagonize that with any bill that may be offered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 17, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table and that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and a conference asked upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to have the amendments read.

Mr. SPARKS. Oh, there are a number of them and the committee recommend non-concurrence in all.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, the amendments of the Senate thereto were non-concurred in, and a conference asked with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. POTTER. I call for the regular order.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. One moment. I ask unanimous consent, at the request of the Committee on Commerce, to have a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discrimination by common carriers printed, so that when the bill comes up for consideration and it is offered gentlemen may be able to understand its provisions.

There was no objection, and the leave to print was granted.

Mr. WADDELL, Mr. WOOD, and others called for the regular order.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to second the previous question on the preamble and resolution offered by him on Monday last.

The question was put; and on a division there were 82 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. HALE. There is no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 122 in the affirmative.

Mr. HALE. None have voted in the negative.

Mr. POTTER. I report the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in the negative, as he has acted as teller.

The SPEAKER. Then there is one vote in the negative.

Mr. HALE. The Chair must take the responsibility of that ruling. Let that be distinctly understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine was one of the tellers, and the gentleman from New York, also one of the tellers, reports him as voting.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from New York cannot report anything but what the two tellers agree upon. I make that point, that neither of the tellers can report anything except what is agreed upon by the two.

Mr. HALE. Let me state what I understand to be the fact in the case.

Mr. WADDELL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is being proceeded with.

Mr. HALE. Let me state my position in this matter. I was appointed by the Chair as one of the tellers as a member of the House, in order, in conjunction with the gentleman from New York, to report the vote. Gentlemen were requested to pass between the tellers. By agreement between the gentleman from New York and myself, as is always the case, in counting for the affirmative side he was counted one "ay." Members then passed through and there were 122 or 123, and to that I agreed. I had not agreed, I have not agreed, and I do not agree with the gentleman from New York in reporting that I voted. As a member of the House I have the same privilege as every other member of the House has here. I did not vote and I announced that none had passed through on the negative side as the gentleman from New York has. Now the gentleman from New York will not say that he and I agreed that one voted in the negative, and assuredly the Chair cannot, when the tellers disagree as to the vote, accept the report of one and ignore that of the other.

Mr. WADDELL. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADDELL. I will if I can get a chance. I object to this explanation going on, because it is not the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is the regular order. It is a question whether the count reported by the tellers was correct or not.

Mr. HALE. On a point of order——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state, in the first place——

Mr. POTTER. I wish to say a word when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is through.

Mr. HALE. I think I have said all I wish to say.

Mr. POTTER. There never can be a dispute with me about a patent question of fact. I did this morning what I have been doing perhaps twenty times during the last few days. Appointed to act as teller with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] I met him, recognized him, and he began by counting me as one voting upon my side; and I began by counting him as one voting on his side, as is the established usage of tellers here.

Mr. HALE. On this occasion, before the gentleman from New York reported the negative vote, I reported that none had voted in the negative.

Mr. POTTER. Hear me through. I reported the gentleman from Maine as voting in the negative, as I have done many times within the last few days, and as he has done also for himself. There can be no dispute about the fact. I acted accordingly this time when I reported him as voting in the negative. The gentleman says he did not vote. That is a question of fact——

Mr. HALE. Who knows better than I whether I voted or not?

Mr. POTTER. Possibly the House does.

Mr. HALE. Does it?

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Maine [Mr. HALE] was appointed to act as one of the tellers, because he was present. His colleagues who refused to vote are constructively absent.

Mr. HALE. Those "present and voting" are those that make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Up to this time the gentleman from Maine has always been counted as one voting in the negative, being a teller and as such participating in the proceedings and not omitting to vote. The Chair accepted the report of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] as to the fact.

Mr. HALE. Supposing the gentleman from New York had reported me as voting in the affirmative, would the Chair have accepted that report?

The SPEAKER. That would have been an unfaithful report.

Mr. HALE. And this is an unfaithful report, for I did not vote at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me, under the rule the Speaker announces that those who are opposed will pass between the tellers. Now, on the negative vote in this case the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] did not pass between the tellers.

The SPEAKER. Oh, that is——

Mr. GARFIELD. And nobody but the gentleman from Maine can vote for him. It is a simple question of fact whether he voted or not. He says that he did not, and the Chair is bound to take his word.

The SPEAKER. It is an absurdity to talk about the gentleman from Maine passing between the tellers, as he was one of the tellers.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order, if I can get the attention of the Speaker for a moment. Who was it that suggested the want of a quorum?

Mr. HALE. I raise the point that no quorum had voted. Now, let us understand——

Mr. CONGER. I object to the report of the tellers, because they do not agree in their count; and I demand a further count.

Mr. POTTER. I do not care to raise any question about this. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was here; nobody can dispute that. The only question is whether he voted. I assumed he did from his past action and his own past reports.

Mr. HALE. I did not vote.

Mr. POTTER. I accept the statement and report "none in the negative."

Mr. HALE. I raise the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. POTTER. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll and also the list of absentees; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Baker, William H.	Foster,	Neal,	Sapp,
Bisbee,	Freeman,	Norcross,	Strait,
Bundy,	Frye,	Phillips,	Townsend, M. I.
Carlisle,	Harris, Benj. W.	Powers,	Watson,
Caswell,	Killinger,	Pugh,	White, Harry
Chittenden,	Landers,	Quinn,	Willits,
Clarke of Kentucky,	Loring,	Rainey,	Wren.
Douglas,	Luttrell,	Roberts,
Ellis,	Metcalfe,	Robinson, M. S.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3570) granting an increase of pension to John Murphy, late private Company F, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877.

The message further announced that the Senate had requested the return by the House of the resolution of the Senate for printing an edition of the Colonial Charters and Constitutions of the United States, sent to the House of Representatives February 5, 1878.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. On the call of the roll two hundred and fifty-eight members have answered to their names.

Mr. POTTER. I have been informed that there are some members who will arrive here shortly, and therefore I will move to dispense with further proceedings under the call. But I give notice that if there is not a quorum voting on the next vote I will move a call of the House and demand that the doors be closed and that the absentees be brought in.

The motion of Mr. POTTER to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question upon the preamble and resolution submitted on Monday last by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. HALE. Pending that I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair, before deciding, look at page 109 of the rules, where the order of motions is given?

The SPEAKER. Further proceedings under the call of the House being dispensed with, the House comes back into the condition in which it was before——

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. When a quorum was not found voting. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] is therefore next in order: the demand for the previous question to again discover whether a quorum is present.

Mr. HALE. But does the Chair hold that when we come back to the condition in which the House was we do not come back under all the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that when proceedings under the call have been dispensed with, which proceedings were for the purpose of securing a quorum, then the House comes back to its former position, and the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from New York to again demand the previous question to ascertain whether a quorum will vote thereon.

Mr. HALE. But, Mr. Speaker, it was disclosed that there was a quorum present. Now the House comes back to the business in which it was engaged, and I ask the Chair to read or have read——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York to demand a vote on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Then does the Chair refuse to have read the rule upon page 109, stating the order of motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not refuse anything of the sort.

Mr. HALE. Will the Clerk read Rule 42?

The Clerk read as follows:

42. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day and at the same stage of the bill or proposition.

The SPEAKER. In the first place this proposition is not "under debate" according to the terms of the rule. In addition, the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman who demands the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the Speaker allow me to say——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BURCHARD. There is no doubt of the correctness of the decision of the Chair that he should recognize the gentleman from New York to make the motion. But, pending that motion and before the motion is submitted to the House or before it is voted on, the motion to lay on the table must be in order.

Mr. HALE. It has always been so held.

The SPEAKER. The very rule itself states that when a subject is "under debate," then the order of motions shall be as specified.

Mr. POTTER. Besides, Mr. Speaker, the House was dividing upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing and found itself without a quorum, and according to all parliamentary practice that has come within the observation of the Chair he is now compelled to recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair allow me to make an inquiry? If I should now move to adjourn, the Chair would certainly be compelled to recognize that motion as of higher privilege than the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That is under another rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, it is under this same rule which specifies the order of motions.

The SPEAKER. But the motion to adjourn is always in order. Less than a quorum can adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly, but there is a quorum; the presence of a quorum has been disclosed by the call of the roll, and the Chair has announced that a quorum is present. Now, the rule to which the gentleman from Maine has called attention declares the order of preference with respect to the motions named, and according to that rule a motion to lay on the table is of higher privilege than the demand for the previous question. The Chair did right, of course, in recognizing the gentleman from New York to make the demand for a vote on the previous question. Now, a motion of higher privilege, namely, a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, including the call for the previous question, including everything connected with the matter, is made by the gentleman from Maine. This being a motion of higher privilege, it seems to me perfectly clear that the Chair is bound to recognize it to be voted on before putting the motion of the gentleman from New York. Of course if the motion to lay on the table does not prevail, then the motion of the gentleman from New York will be next in order.

Mr. WADDELL. I hope we will have a vote on the motion to lay on the table the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it is not in order under the terms of the rule. This proposition has not been under debate. Moreover even the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] does not contend that the motion to second the demand for the previous question should not be entertained first.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] under parliamentary usage, is entitled to recognition to make the motion. But before the motion is put or while it is being put before the vote is taken any gentleman, in my judgment, would have the right to make the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, and have a vote upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] demands the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Has the Chair ruled that he will not entertain my motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules, first, that the question is not in the condition where Rule 42 applies; and, in the second place, that he is bound to recognize the gentleman from New York; that the House, after a call has been disposed of, reverts back into the condition where it was found without a quorum—to secure one.

Mr. HALE. I must respectfully take an appeal from that decision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. POTTER. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. HALE. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STENGER. Will the Chair state the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that the condition does not exist in the House under which Rule 42 is operative; that on the contrary, after a call of the House to secure a quorum shall have been disposed of, the House goes back to the situation in which it was originally when dividing on the motion of the gentleman from New York; and the Chair again recognizes the gentleman from New York for that motion.

Mr. HALE. The Chair will also state that the proceedings disclosed that a quorum was present and that upon that ground further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The House comes back to its condition when a call was required, and that is a condition of division.

Mr. HALE. How could a motion to adjourn come in?

The SPEAKER. Because less than a quorum can adjourn at any time.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow me one word? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 114, not voting 34; as follows:

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE.

Mr. MCKENZIE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. CLARKE, is paired with Mr. WATSON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with Mr. POWERS, of Maine. If he were present, Mr. CARLILSE would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to demand the regular order, but I desire to be permitted to ask a question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] who moved to lay the whole subject on the table. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine whether, if I withdraw——

Mr. CONGER. I object to anything in the nature of discussion whatever. [Cries of "All right!" from the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. POTTER. I only wanted to ask if gentlemen on the other side of the House intended to stop filibustering, and I see now that they do not.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and, on a division, there were 128 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. POTTER and Mr. HALE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 140 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. HALE. No quorum voted.

Mr. POTTER. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon Mr. POTTER's motion; and there were—yeas 150, nays 110, not voting 31; as follows:

So a call of the House was ordered.

During the roll-call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I desire to announce that I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to announce that I have telegraphed to my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, with whom I have paired, but have been unable to get an answer, and the gentleman who has the matter in charge refuses to release me from the operation of the pair. If my colleague were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. WIGGINTON. I would inquire if the gentleman with whom the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] is paired is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not know; but I think he is.

The SPEAKER. He is absent by leave of the House for two weeks from the 1st day of May.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Then his time has expired and he is absent without leave.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut.

Mr. McCOOK. My colleague, Mr. TOWNSEND, is paired with my other colleague, Mr. COVERT.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his private secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1750) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876;

An act (H. R. No. 3989) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) authorizing Lieutenant T. B. M. Mason, United States Navy, to accept a medal conferred by the King of Italy for extinguishing a fire on a powder-ship.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now proceed to call the roll.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll and the list of absentees; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Baker, William H.	Frye,	Powers,	Strait,
Bisbee,	Harris, Benj. W.	Pugh,	Townsend, M. I.
Bundy,	Killinger,	Quinn,	Watson,
Carlisle,	Landers,	Robinson M. S.	Willits.
Clarke of Kentucky,	Loring,	Sapp,
Freeman,	Metcalfe,	Stephens,

The SPEAKER. The Clerk reports that upon the call of the roll two hundred and sixty-nine members answered to their names. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. POTTER. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest, take into custody, and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of privilege. The rule authorizes the Speaker to issue his warrant for those who are absent without leave of the House and are not excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the list of those absent by leave of the House, and will protect them.

Mr. CONGER. No doubt of that; but the rule also includes those excused. The Chair is putting a proposition without asking for excuses. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rose, I do not know for what purpose.

The SPEAKER. The House has instructed the Chair how to proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. The resolution ought to except in form those who have been excused and have leave of the House to be absent.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read; the Chair thinks it does that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not hear any excepting clause.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman did not listen attentively. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read Rule 36.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon the call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; after which the names of the absentees shall again be called over; the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will conform to the practice.

Mr. O'NEILL. When will be the proper time to give excuses for absent members? I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, is absent on account of severe illness. Word was sent to me this morning to that effect by his physician.

The SPEAKER. In order to expedite business the Chair will hear excuses at any time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that my colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, be excused.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether Mr. FREEMAN is paired with anybody on this side of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think not. He was paired up to Monday last and then the pair was dissolved.

The motion of Mr. O'NEILL was agreed to; and accordingly Mr. FREEMAN was excused.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. My colleague, Mr. WILLITS, is absent by leave of the House. Day before yesterday I was informed that his leave had expired and I telegraphed him to come on. He replied that he was in the middle of an important case, but would return as soon as possible. He is not paired. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. The rule requires that after the list of absentees has been noted the doors shall be closed and then the list of absentees shall be called over for excuses. I ask that the rule be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is the proper time to hear excuses.

Mr. CLYMER. Does not the rule require that the doors shall be closed?

The SPEAKER. The doors are closed.

Mr. SAYLER. And the list of absentees has been called in compliance with the rules.

Mr. CLYMER. The rule requires the list to be called over.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the rule that requires that the list be called the second time. The first part of the rule says that the absentees shall be noted and that then their names shall be again called, all of which has been done. The Chair is quite willing to have them called again for the information of the House, if there is no objection.

Mr. PRICE. I ask that my colleague, Mr. SAPP, be excused. He was called away on business that he could not avoid and expected to be back here about this time and thought that he had leave of absence. He is not paired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to excusing the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SAPP?

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

The question was taken on the motion to excuse Mr. SAPP; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the several votes excusing members; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAPO. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is detained in his room on account of sickness, and has been absent on that account for some days. I understand that he is paired with Mr. GOODE, of Virginia.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to say that the gentleman is entirely incorrect in the statement he has just made. The member from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] is not paired with me, and he was notified to that effect several days ago.

Mr. CRAPO. Was there not a pair existing between my colleague and the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. GOODE. There was a pair existing between your colleague and myself; but when I returned from my visit to Norfolk recently with the Secretary of the Navy, I wrote to your colleague a note stating that, under the circumstances, I desired the pair to exist no longer. He replied that he was anxious that it should continue, and asked me that it might be observed further. I respected the request for that day, Tuesday. No arrangement was made by him. He said he had written to a gentleman on the other side to make a further arrangement for him. No arrangement was made; and inasmuch as the republican members of the House had systematically pursued a course which prevented a quorum, I refused to continue the pair, so notifying the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any reflection on this side of the House.

Mr. REED. There should not be any objection. Gentlemen on the other side ought to be allowed to make some excuse for doing such a thing.

Mr. CONGER. It is a simple question of honor whether the gentleman will break his pair.

Mr. GOODE. I will let the gentleman from Michigan understand that I can take care of my own honor; and if he assails it he shall be held personally responsible. [Applause and hisses.]

Mr. CONGER. The "gentleman from Michigan" trembles in his boots, as in duty bound.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be seated, and the House will come to order.

Mr. BEEBE. I give notice that I object——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain nothing until gentlemen are seated. The officers of the House will see that they are seated.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the words of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] be taken down and ruled upon by the Chair. It is time that we should make a precedent and establish what is proper language to be used here in debate. I ask that the words be taken down and that the Chair rule whether they are parliamentary or not.

Mr. SPARKS. The words of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. HALE. The words of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Michigan was the offender. His words should be taken down. My colleague could not have said less.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask that if any words of my colleague [Mr. GOODE] be taken down, the offensive words of the gentleman from Michigan, previously used, be also taken down.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HALE. Let them all be taken down.

Mr. McCOOK. Would it be in order to appoint a committee of eleven members to investigate this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to read Rules 61 and 62.

The Clerk read as follows:

61. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case, the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House. (March 13, 1822, and September 14, 1837;) and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.—April 7, 1789, and March 13, 1822.

62. If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken.—September 14, 1837.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] demands that the words of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] be taken down. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] asks that the words of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] be taken down. The words of the gentlemen, respectively, will be taken down in order, and when so taken down the Chair will rule thereon.

Mr. MAYHAM. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAYHAM. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in asking that the words of the gentleman from Virginia be taken down did not repeat the words, as required by the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. The words will be taken down, and when they are read by the Clerk the Chair will rule thereon.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Let them be taken down; they are all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONGER. It is a simple question of honor whether the gentleman will break his pair.

Mr. GOODE. I will let the gentleman from Michigan understand that I can take care of my own honor, and if he assails it he shall be held personally responsible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the offensive provocation came from the gentleman from Michigan first, [applause from the democratic side,] and that you might as well expect a child not to halloo when struck as have expected the gentleman from Virginia not to retort when assailed. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" from the republican side.]

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair hold the words were parliamentary—the latter portion of the words of the gentleman from Virginia, wherein he declared that he would hold another member personally responsible?

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair rule that those words were parliamentary? I did not ask the Chair to rule on what might be expected. I asked him to rule on the question whether the words were parliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the words of the gentleman from Michigan were not parliamentary, if used in an offensive sense. If a man's honor can be assailed here it should be defended here.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Michigan did not attempt on this floor to raise the question of personal responsibility.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate. I make the point of order, because this is an attempt to take us away from the business before the House. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order will be proceeded with.

Mr. HALE. What is the ruling of the Chair on the words of the gentleman from Virginia?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that if the language was intended by both gentlemen to be offensive it was not parliamentary. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I submit that this is not a question of hypothesis. It is a question whether the words used were parliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled upon that point.

Mr. HALE. I have asked the Chair not to rule hypothetically, but to rule whether the words were parliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to have the gentleman from Maine put a ruling in his mouth. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. HALE. But I ask for a ruling which is not hypothetical. I have a right to a ruling from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled, and it is unnecessary that he should repeat his ruling in the same words he uttered a moment ago.

Mr. SAYLER. If the gentleman from Maine is dissatisfied with the decision he can take an appeal.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman from Maine can determine his course of action without the assistance of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair decline to rule further?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing further to rule about.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair decline to rule that the words were parliamentary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that if the words were intended to be offensive they undoubtedly were not parliamentary.

Mr. HALE. The question on which I desire the ruling of the Chair is whether they were parliamentary or not.

Mr. BEEBE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Maine is not in order. The regular order is the carrying out of the proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The regular order will be proceeded with.

Mr. HALE. I have a right to a ruling.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to an appeal if dissatisfied.

Mr. HALE. I have heard no ruling from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is the fault of the gentleman's comprehension, not of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. I want a direct ruling.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to his appeal if dissatisfied.

Mr. HALE. I submit that the Chair has not ruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that he has ruled, and the gentleman's remedy, if he does not like the ruling, is to appeal.

Mr. HALE. The Chair then declines to rule further?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE. Then that is settled.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask if the Chair stated in his ruling that I used the words I did in an offensive sense? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking a question and it is right that he should have that opportunity.

Mr. CONGER. I ask if the Chair intended to state that I used the words I did in an offensive sense?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that if the gentleman intended the language he used offensively, it was unparliamentary.

Mr. CONGER. Did the Chair intend to decide or did he rule that he thought my words unparliamentary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not to decide what he thinks, he has to decide upon the rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps that ought not to be expected.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move that my colleague, Mr. QUINN, who is sick at his home, be excused.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. QUINN was excused.

Mr. ITTNER. I move that my colleague, Mr. METCALFE, be excused; he left the city last night with a sick wife, to return to Saint Louis.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to know if he is paired.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the leave will be granted.

Mr. SPARKS. Is he paired?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. That is a matter for private arrangement.

Mr. SPARKS. Is he paired?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. METCALFE is paired with me generally on political questions, but not on this question or anything growing out of it.

The question was put on Mr. ITTNER's motion; and it was agreed to, and Mr. METCALFE was excused.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I move that my colleague, Mr. PUGH, be excused; he has been called away from the city by serious illness in his family, and I understand that he is not paired.

Mr. EDEN. If he is paired he ought only to be excused on the condition that the pair shall be released.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that Mr. PUGH is not paired.

The question was put on Mr. SINNICKSON's motion; and it was agreed to, and Mr. PUGH was excused.

Mr. CRAPO. What action has been taken by the House upon my motion that my colleague, Mr. LORING, be excused?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that any further demand was made for that excuse, but the Chair will now submit that motion to the House.

The question was put on Mr. CRAPO's motion, and it was agreed to; and Mr. LORING was excused.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that my colleague, Mr. KILLINGER, be excused; he is absent from the city, and I am informed that he is not paired.

The question was put on Mr. THOMPSON's motion; and it was agreed to, and Mr. KILLINGER was excused.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I came here from my bed half an hour ago, thinking the country was in danger. I do not see that anything is likely to happen and I ask to be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he came to the House from a sick-bed and he would like to be excused so that he may return thereto.

There was no objection, and Mr. CHITTENDEN was excused.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope he will pair before he leaves the Hall. [Cries of "Let him pair with you!"]

Mr. BAYNE. I understood that my colleague, Mr. WATSON, had obtained leave of absence of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SOUTHARD in the chair.) What action does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to know whether or not my colleague is absent by leave of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not leave of absence. Does the gentleman move that he be excused?

Mr. BAYNE. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BAYNE. I did not make any motion.

[After a pause.]

Mr. HUNTER. I move that my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, be excused. We have released the pair.

Mr. BEEBE. I would inquire of the gentleman if his colleague is sick?

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know if he is sick or not; the pair is released.

The question was put on Mr. HUNTER's motion; and it was agreed to, and Mr. ROBINSON was excused.

[After a pause.]

Mr. BROWNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order pending a call of the House. The only motion in order is to dispense with further proceedings under that call.

Mr. BROWNE. Then I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was put; and upon a division there were—ayes 94, noes 120.

Mr. BROWNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 146, not voting 42; as follows:

So the motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. COVERT. I desire to again announce that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MARTIN I. TOWNSEND. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I am paired with Mr. STRAIT, of Minnesota.

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague, Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. WATSON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut.

Mr. BAYNE. My colleague, Mr. WATSON, is paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky. If present, Mr. WATSON would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE. Would it be now in order to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. BROWNE. So I thought. I do not desire to make it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER, (at three o'clock and five minutes p. m.) I am informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that every member of the House who is within reach to-day is now in the Capitol. I therefore move to dispense with all further proceedings under this call in order to give gentlemen who are scattered about in the committee-rooms an opportunity to come into the Hall; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps it will not be necessary to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. POTTER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. On this question I am paired with Mr. STRAIT, of Minnesota. If he were present, I would vote "ay." I am not paired with him upon seconding the previous question, and am at liberty to vote upon that question.

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] Not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I decline to vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and the tellers will resume their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 148, [great applause on the democratic side,] no 1.

So the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Shall the main question be now put?

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. McCOOK. My colleague from New York, Mr. TOWNSEND, is paired with my colleague, Mr. COVERT. Mr. TOWNSEND, if here, would vote "ay" and Mr. COVERT "no."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. LANDERS. If he were present, he would vote in the negative and I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SINNICKSON. My colleague, Mr. PUGH, is absent on account of severe illness in his family.

When the roll-call was concluded and had been read over by the Clerk, but before the result was announced,

Mr. BANKS said: Mr. Speaker, I notice that the name of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GOODE, has been read to the House as voting on this question. I object to his vote upon the ground that he is paired with my colleague, Mr. LORING.

The SPEAKER. That matter has been the subject of controversy already, but the Chair has nothing to do with it. Pairs do not come within the direction of the Chair. The Chair desires to state in this connection that the practice formerly was never to have pairs operate to prevent the consideration of business; they applied only to the merits of a subject when before the House.

Mr. BANKS. If the Chair and the House will allow me I will state briefly the reason of my objection. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BANKS. I raise a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKS. I object to the vote of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GOODE, as recorded in the list just read, upon the ground that he has paired his vote against that of my colleague, Mr. LORING, who is unable to be here.

Mr. GOODE. I deny it.

Mr. BANKS. This pair, Mr. Speaker, was not made by the gentleman from Virginia and my colleague alone, but was made with the consent of the House upon an announcement to the House. I submit that no member has ever been allowed to vote under such circumstances, and no pair has ever been disregarded under such circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Neither the House nor the Chair has anything to do with pairs.

Mr. WOOD. The rules do not recognize them.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not recognize pairs.

Mr. BANKS. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals from the decision that the Chair has nothing to do with pairs.

Mr. GOODE. I submit that I have a right to be heard on this question. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BANKS. I do not raise any question as to the duty of the Chair. I desire to state my point a little more clearly, if the Chair misunderstood me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear it stated more clearly.

Mr. BANKS. My objection is not that the Chair has, or has not, anything to do with pairs. My objection is that the vote of the gentleman from Virginia should not be counted, because he has agreed to pair his vote with that of my colleague, and this has been done with the consent of the House.

Mr. GOODE. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he is mistaken.

Mr. BANKS. I ask a ruling upon the right of the gentleman to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has nothing to do with the subject; but he is quite willing, if the gentleman from Massachusetts desires a ruling upon the question, to give one.

Mr. BANKS. I desire a ruling upon the right of a member to vote under these circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that he has no control whatever over pairs; that they are matters between individual members; that any questions arising out of pairs are to be determined by the members concerned; that neither the Chair nor even the House can determine such questions.

Mr. BANKS. I object to the recording of the gentleman's vote.

Mr. GOODE. In view of the statement which has been made on the other side, I ask to be heard.

Mr. BANKS. I object to the right of the gentleman to vote, and ask the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that he has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. BANKS. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GOODE. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit that under the circumstances gentlemen on the other side ought certainly to be willing to hear what I have to say.

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GOODE. Now, sir, I will make this statement: several days ago—about ten days ago—I received a note from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] with whom my relations are of the most friendly and kindly character, stating to me that he was confined to his room by indisposition and asking me to pair with him. I do not remember the exact date; it was perhaps about ten days ago. I agreed that I would pair with him. That pair continued for several days, I cannot state now without reference to the RECORD exactly how many, until last Friday, when the gentleman from Massachusetts appeared in his seat upon this floor, remaining here for some time. I met him in the cloak-room and he stated to me that he was unwell, suffering from a bad cold, and that he desired to return to his quarters, and asked me if I would pair with him for that day. I said, "Certainly; it is entirely convenient to me; and I expect to leave today to accompany the Secretary of the Navy on his proposed visit to the Norfolk navy-yard." I went off on Friday afternoon, not supposing for an instant that the pair between the gentleman and myself was expected to continue longer than that day. I returned here on Tuesday morning and found the House engaged in the matter now under consideration. I did not suppose that I was under any obligation whatever to observe my pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts longer; but, finding him absent, as a matter of extreme courtesy and caution on my part, I addressed him a note from my seat stating that I had returned finding the House considering the matter now under consideration and that I intended to vote. I received a note from him stating that he was still unwell and expressing a hope that I would continue the pair with him still longer until he could make further arrangements, stating also that he had written to his colleague [Mr. CRAPO] to find another pair for him.

Not believing that I was in any sense bound longer, I still, as a matter of courtesy only and from my respect to the gentleman's wish and desire to accommodate him as far as I could, without any promise whatever on my part and without any answer to that note, abstained from voting throughout the day on Tuesday.

On Wednesday morning I addressed the gentleman a note, stating that the action of the republican members on this floor in preventing a quorum had in my judgment rendered it my duty as a Representative to cast my vote; and I accordingly notified him to that effect. That is all that occurred between us, and I undertake to say, sir, no matter what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] may say, that if Dr. LORING were here he would substantiate every word that I have said. And I do not believe he would take the position before this House that I was bound by any agreement to observe the pair longer than on Friday last. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. BANKS. Upon the statement the honorable gentleman from Virginia has just made, if he understood he was paired but for one day with my colleague, I should not for one instant hold him to any further recognition of that obligation than for the day that it was made. But I was informed differently; and out of respect to the rights of my colleague and of the delegation to which I belong, as well as with regard to the importance of this question of pairing, which is one of the most important matters that occur in our proceedings I thought it my duty to call the attention of the House to it. But upon the statement the gentleman has made I have no desire to proceed further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only desires further to say that the name of the gentleman from Virginia was called and he voted as was his right under the Constitution and under the rules of the House, and that the Chair has nothing to do with preventing him from voting.

Mr. BANKS. The Chair will allow me to say that if the gentleman from Virginia had agreed to pair with my colleague and that pair had been reported to the House and had received its sanction, he had no right to vote until he was released from the obligation.

The SPEAKER. The House never sanctions pairs. It never takes any cognizance of them. It is a matter of convenience among members only and they put themselves into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD thereby. They do not go on the Journal at all as paired. Gentlemen who are paired stand there as absentees. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to announce that my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. WATSON, is paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky, on all political questions. Mr. WATSON, if present, would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. POTTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay the resolution on the table was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nay 1, not voting 143; as follows:

So the main question was ordered.

During roll-call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with Mr. FRYE. I would vote "ay," if he were present.

Mr. WELCH, (who had voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. [Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. BLAIR, (who had voted in the negative.) Having voted under a misapprehension, I withdraw my vote. [Cries of "Object!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks that as the gentleman states that he voted under a misapprehension he be allowed to withdraw his vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I never knew that privilege to be refused in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that there need not be any controversy.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not anticipate that there will be any.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] withdraws his vote, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WELCH] asks the same privilege. The Chair hears no objection, and the votes are withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that I am paired with Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. On ordering the main question there are yeas 147, nay 1. [Applause.] So the main question is ordered; and the question recurs on the adoption of the preamble and resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. HALE. Upon that question I ask for a division.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call attention to the fact that the names were not read upon the last vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will cause them to be read now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not make the point. I suppose it was overlooked, but there might be some mistake in recording the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the names read so as to guard against mistakes.

The Clerk then read the names upon the last roll-call.

Mr. MILLS. I desire again to make my appeal to the gentleman from New York and to the House to hear me for ten minutes. [Loud cries of "Hear him!" from the republican side of the House and "Regular order!" from the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. POTTER. It is with extreme regret that I do not feel at liberty to yield to the request of my friend from Texas.

The question was taken on the adoption of the preamble and resolution; and there were—yeas 146, nays 2, not voting 143; as follows:

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COVERT said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MARTIN I. TOWNSEND. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. POTTER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LUTTRELL. According to the last vote the gentleman from Ohio and all his republican friends were absent.

Mr. POTTER. I will not detain the House longer to-night, and will withdraw the motion to reconsider and table.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that on to-morrow——

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote on the prevailing side?

Mr. HALE. I have not completed my announcement; it has no reference to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that to-morrow he would move to reconsider the vote just taken. The confusion makes it difficult to hear.

Mr. HALE. I did not say that; I have no announcement to make in regard to that matter.

The SPEAKER. What notice does the gentleman give?

Mr. HALE. I do not enter any motion now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as he has already stated, will hear any gentleman who has any resolution to offer on this subject.

Mr. COX, of New York. I renew the motion to reconsider and lay on the table, so as to wind up this matter.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. POTTER. Gentlemen around me say they do not wish to be detained here longer to-day, and I will therefore move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair desires to lay before the House a message from the President.

Mr. HALE. Has the call for the yeas and nays been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider and table has been withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] moves that the House now adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is there not a motion pending to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the last vote?

The SPEAKER. There is no motion to reconsider pending; the Chair understood that motion to be withdrawn by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] The motion to adjourn is now pending. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The motion of Mr. POTTER was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANKS: Memorial of H. D. Jarves, of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Tagus, Maine, for the amendment of the pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 18, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOK. On the passage of the preamble and resolution yesterday, I am recorded in the Journal as not voting. I was present and voted "ay," as my colleague, [Mr. HARTRIDGE,] who was near me at the time, can certify.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected.

The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I desire to supply a deficiency in the RECORD as regards myself. I announced yesterday that I was paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I afterward absented myself from the House by leave of the House, and I do not see any announcement in the RECORD that I was absent by leave when the vote was taken upon the passage of the preamble and resolution. I desire further to state that if I had been present and not paired I would have voted against the preamble and resolution as adopted.

ELECTION CONTEST—RICHARDSON VS. RAINEY.

Mr. ELLIS, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report, with an accompanying resolution, in the contested-election case of Richardson vs. Rainey, in the first congressional district of South Carolina.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there was no free, fair, and peaceable election in the first congressional district of South Carolina, in November, 1876, and that neither Joseph H. Rainey nor John S. Richardson is entitled to a seat from said district in the Forty-fifth Congress by virtue of said election, and that said seat is hereby declared vacant.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to give notice that on Thursday next I will call up the report and resolution in this case.

Mr. HALE. Is there a minority report in this case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to inquire.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I think the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] of the Committee of Elections, has a minority report prepared in this case, but I do not see him in his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will allow the minority report to come in as though presented at this time, and the two reports will be presented together as usual.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to make a privileged report.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints Mr. SPARKS, Mr. SINGLETON, and Mr. BAKER of Indiana, the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 930) granting a pension to Mary B. Marsh;

An act (H. R. No. 251) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia;

An act (H. R. No. 3121) for the relief of Numis H. Coverdale;

An act (H. R. No. 3570) granting an increase of pension to John Murphy, late private Company F, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 3824) to authorize the survey of the Cattaraugus Indian reservation in the State of New York; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Society of the Sons of St. George, established at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,440.25, in gold, being the amount paid by said society upon a colossal statue of St. George and the Dragon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks in response to remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the repeal of the bankrupt law.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask permission to have printed some remarks in regard to the internal revenue.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAYHAM, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, bills of the following titles; which were ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider:

A bill (H. R. No. 4785) for the improvement of the sewerage of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

COMPLETION OF WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) to enable the joint commission to carry into effect the act of Congress providing for the completion of the Washington Monument be taken from the Speaker's table and non-concurred in.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour, unless some matter of higher privilege intervenes.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is there any unfinished business coming over from last evening?

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to make a privileged report—a report from a conference committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a personal question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York in a few moments. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] rises to make a privileged report.

WEST POINT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2507, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

M. J. DURHAM,
HIESTER CLYMER,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. WINDOM,
J. G. BLAINE,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and ask a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL ATLAS OF COLORADO, ETC.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Committee on Printing have directed me to report the following as a substitute for a resolution referred to that committee:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be bound 300 copies of the Geological and Geographical Atlas of Colorado and portions of the adjacent territory under the Hayden survey; one copy for distribution to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives and Delegate from the Territories; the balance for distribution by the office of the survey; the style of binding to be determined by the joint committee of the two Houses on printing.

I call the previous question on the adoption of this resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; under the operation of which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURETIES OF JOHN M'NELLIS.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for present consideration, as a substitute for House bill No. 543, a bill (H. R. No. 4874) for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis.

The bill was read for information. It provides that Jeremiah Collins and Martin Hynds, sureties upon a certain bond of John McNellis, of Grundy County, Illinois, to the United States, bearing date May 1, 1871, and Philip Collins and Harrison Enix, sureties upon a certain other bond of McNellis to the United States, dated April 29, 1872, be released and discharged from liability or payment of money under said bonds, or either of them, and from the payment of any judgment or judgments entered upon said bonds, or either of them. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized and directed to cancel and release two certain judgments heretofore entered upon said bonds, respectively, in the United States circuit court for the northern district of Illinois against McNellis and his sureties, or any of them.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is there a written report?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred House bill No. 543, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to credit on certain judgments obtained by the Government of the United States against John McNellis and his sureties, the taxes assessed on certain spirits destroyed by fire, and the interest and penalties added thereto, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

John McNellis, of Aux Sable, Grundy County, Illinois, was on the 1st day of May, 1871, a distiller of spirits at that place, and as such executed a bond to the United States in the penal sum of $30,000, in which Jeremiah Collins and Martin Hynds became obligated as sureties. He continued in the prosecution of the business until the 1st day of May, 1872, when he executed another and similar bond for $35,000, in which Philip Collins and Harrison Enix were sureties.

On the 6th day of May, 1872, his distillery, warehouse, and other buildings connected therewith, were entirely destroyed by an accidental fire, at which time there were in said buildings, in the custody of a United States storekeeper, 17,348 taxable gallons of spirits. The warehouse in which the spirits were situated was near the distillery from which the fire was communicated, and the storekeeper would not allow the spirits to be removed until the fire had reached the warehouse, and there was then insufficient time to save but a small part, unless additional openings for the purpose were made through the building which the storekeeper, in his unreasonably strict interpretation of the law, refused to permit. Of the 17,348 gallons in the warehouse only 4,675 gallons were saved.

In April, 1871, McNellis forwarded from his distillery at Aux Sable three hundred and fifty barrels of distilled spirits manufactured by him there to the United States warehouse in Chicago, known as the Burlington warehouse, which was accidentally destroyed by fire on the 30th day of September, 1871, while all said spirits were stored therein, on which he had previously paid to the Government $13,955.90 in taxes and for stamps. These spirits were entirely destroyed and all the barrels in which they were contained were duly stamped and numbered, and McNellis was at the time of their destruction the owner of them and also owned the distillery and other buildings and their contents at Aux Sable when destroyed, and all said property was uninsured.

The United States ganger at Aux Sable had on the day of the fire, which broke out in the cupola of the building about nine o'clock in the evening, been ganging the spirits in the distillery and placing them in the warehouse. His custom was to stamp the barrels containing the spirits so ganged and remove them from the warehouse on the day they were stamped. On that day he sent for stamps which he had previously ordered from the United States collector of that district and which the collector or his deputy had promised should be ready, but they were not to be had, and consequently the barrels containing 12,673 gallons remained in the building unstamped and were destroyed.

The United States collector for that district had in his possession and subject to his order for the payment of United States taxes money sufficient to cancel the same as they accrued, but neglected to apply them to that purpose, and also neglected to make distraint and sale of property and enforcement of the Government lien thereon, although there was at all times prior to the destruction of the same by fire sufficient available for the purpose.

McNellis is insolvent from the aforesaid destruction of his property and business.

McNellis appears to have been a very honest man, with large pecuniary means and credit, but very illiterate, being unable to either read or write, and therefore to avoid any irregularity in his business or default in the payment of his taxes had made the aforesaid arrangement with his banker and the collector.

After his property was destroyed by fire he erected a new warehouse and distillery and placed in the latter the necessary machinery of the most perfect character for the successful prosecution of his business. These buildings and machinery were provided at an expense of $30,000, and entirely absorbed his remaining means. All this property was subsequently distrained by the Government and sold, and the net proceeds, amounting to only some $2,400, applied toward the liquidation of the taxes, penalties, and interest which had accrued. Upon this sale the Government was the purchaser, and it still holds the title to the property for a consideration greatly below its cost and value, and the time for redemption of the same has expired.

In February, 1876, the Government of the United States commenced suits on both said bonds in the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois for taxes for the months of February, March, April, and May, 1872, and subsequently recovered judgment in the suit on the first-mentioned bond for $15,691.51, and in that on the other, which related only to the fractional part of the month of May prior to the fire, for $497.50, including penalties and interest.

Most of the matters here found were pleaded in those actions and held by the court to constitute an insufficient legal defense.

The committee are of opinion that both the loss of the spirits by the fire at Aux Sable and the failure to promptly collect the taxes, included in said judgments, were owing to the misjudgment and neglect of the local revenue officers of the Government, and that the case presents very strong equitable claims to relief, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill referred to them.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 4874; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following gentlemen as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Military Academy appropriation bill: Mr. DURHAM, Mr. CLYMER, and Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania.

FISHERY-COMMISSION AWARD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit for your appropriate action a communication from the Secretary of State on the subject of the result of the deliberations of the fishery commission appointed under certain provisions of the treaty of Washington, with the accompanying documents.

Article 22 of the treaty provides that any sum of money which the commissioners may award shall be paid by the United States Government, in a gross sum, within twelve months after such award shall have been given.

The commission announced the result of its deliberations on the 23d day of November, last year, and an appropriation at the present session of Congress will be necessary to enable the Government to make the payment provided for in the treaty.

I respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress the record of the transaction as presented upon the papers, and recommend an appropriation of the necessary sum with such discretion to the Executive Government in regard to its payment as in the wisdom of Congress the public interests may seem to require.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 17, 1878.

Mr. SWANN moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with leave to have them printed if the committee deem it necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER. There is a large accumulation of executive documents upon the Speaker's table, and if there be no objection the Chair will take the liberty of presenting them to the House for reference to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MILLS. I object in order that we may have a morning hour.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from Saturday last, which is a bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up for consideration the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire whether, if the motion of the gentleman of New York should be adopted and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, the effect will be to displace, as the unfinished business in order before the House, the bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The SPEAKER. The technical motion would be for the gentleman from New York to raise the question of consideration as against the unfinished business, which would leave that unfinished business to stand, if the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to come up again as unfinished business without loss of position.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is the purpose of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I trust then that unfinished business will not be displaced.

The SPEAKER. Raising the question of consideration is the practical mode of testing the sense of the House between the Army appropriation bill and the interstate commerce bill, which comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I raise, then, the question of consideration, for the purpose, as I have already indicated, of moving to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. STENGER. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether the substitute which he proposed for the interstate commerce bill has yet been printed?

Mr. REAGAN. It has been printed and is in the document-room.

Mr. STENGER. But has not yet been distributed to members.

Mr. BUTLER. I rose a while ago for the purpose of calling up the motion to reconsider the vote by which a bill (H. R. No. 3079) to provide means for giving official notice of the acts of the Government, and to provide for the advertisements required by the several Departments of the Government, was recommitted to the Commitee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to raise the question of consideration as against the unfinished business.

Mr. BUTLER. I will leave those two gentlemen to fight it out.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If on that question of consideration the Army appropriation bill should now be taken up——

The SPEAKER. If the question is raised on the consideration of the bill in reference to interstate commerce and the House determines not to proceed with that business at this time, the gentleman from New York will be recognized and he will then find himself in antagonism with the gentleman from Massachusetts, who rises to call up a motion to reconsider.

Mr. KENNA. My inquiry goes further. If the motion of the gentleman from New York should prevail and the Army appropriation bill taken up, after that is disposed of what will be the condition of the unfinished business? Would it then come up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It would come up as the unfinished business in regular order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a division on the question of consideration.

The House divided; and there were ayes 34, noes not counted.

Mr. REAGAN. No further count is desired.

So the House refused to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

NEW MINTS AND METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, moved that all the additional testimony taken by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures upon the subject of new mints, and all testimony taken by the same committee on the subject of weights and measures and the metric system in connection therewith, be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the Army appropriation bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COX, of New York. I beg to withdraw a motion I understood I made last evening and which I think is outstanding, not having been withdrawn by myself. I now withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman did not make his motion, or it was made subsequent to the motion to adjourn. Under the understanding the Chair recognized the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] as having control of the subject on their respective sides.

Mr. COX, of New York. The RECORD shows I made the motion.

The SPEAKER. After the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. Not after the motion to adjourn. But I do not care about having a controversy in regard to it. I withdraw the motion. I send to the reporters to be printed the extract from the RECORD.

The extract is as follows:

Mr. POTTER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LUTTRELL. According to the last vote the gentleman from Ohio and all his republican friends were absent.

Mr. POTTER. I will not detain the House longer to-night, and will withdraw the motion to reconsider and table.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that on to-morrow——

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote on the prevailing side?

Mr. HALE. I have not completed my announcement; it has no reference to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that to-morrow he would move to reconsider the vote just taken. The confusion makes it difficult to hear.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill, I desire to submit a motion that the bill be reprinted for the use of the House, the first supply having been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLS. Were all points of order reserved on this bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They were. I ask now that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. CALKINS. Will that in any way interfere with general debate upon this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course not.

There being no objection, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, in reply to a request which has been made of me, I desire to say in the outset that at the present time I do not propose to limit general debate upon this bill. Later in the discussion, after it has been ascertained how many gentlemen desire to be heard, and the nature of the discussion is disclosed, it will then be possible for me to make a motion in that particular. My desire is that this important measure shall receive as thorough a discussion as can be had with a due regard to other pressing subjects of legislation.

Whenever I have had occasion to address this House, and the opportunity was a fitting one, I have endeavored to impress upon it, and through this House upon the public at large, some idea of the magnificent future which awaits this country, provided its legislation can be adapted to its natural resources. If ever there was a country in which poverty and distress should be unknown it is this favored land.

In studying its resources, every day I am more and more filled with admiration at the treasures which have been intrusted to its people. Nothing but individual folly or the inability of the legislative power to comprehend what has been given to us, what trusts we are to execute, can prevent this country from becoming the richest and most prosperous and the happiest on the face of the globe. Its productive power is simply unlimited. Every useful commodity can be produced in this country with less exertion of human labor than anywhere on the face of the globe. With its territory thus endowed, only sparsely occupied, the voice of distress should never be heard in this land.

The productive power of labor measures its reward, unless some portion of that reward is diverted from the hand that earns it. The only certain method of diversion, where stable government is organized, which the ingenuity of man has been able to arrange is through the machinery of taxation. In older countries governed by absolute monarchies or controlled by aristocratic oligarchies, it is through the machinery of taxation that the system is perpetuated. The earnings of labor are diverted for the support of idle classes who do not contribute but who consume—nati consumere fruges. The whole theory of this Government is that taxation is to be kept at its minimum in order that the reward of labor may attain its maximum. Hence I have never allowed my attention since I have had the honor to have a seat on this floor to be diverted from what in this country is the crucial test of statesmanship, the reduction of the burdens of taxation in order that the hand of labor may take the reward and keep the reward which it has earned.

Owing to various causes, which I shall not now attempt to enumerate, we are at present the most heavily taxed people in the world. By the estimate of Mr. Gastrell, who was attached to the British legation in this country in 1874, our taxation, national, State, and municipal, exceeded that of Great Britain by 37 per cent. in amount, although the basis of accumulated wealth in this country is far less; thus increasing the burden to a degree well-nigh intolerable. Under our peculiar system of government, national taxation is substantially levied upon consumption, and hence its pressure is direct and immediate upon the laboring classes, and every reduction which we can effect in the amount of taxation is a practical addition to the wages of labor.

The Committee on Appropriations has therefore never ceased its endeavors, in view of the reduced earnings of the laboring classes of this country, to keep down the expenditures of the Government to the narrowest possible limits consistent with its efficient administration, bearing in mind, however, that parsimony is not economy, and that while extravagance should be rooted out, the vigor of the Administration should not be weakened. In this spirit we have taken up the several appropriation bills with the determination, so far as was possible, to bring back the Government to the basis of simplicity on which it was founded by the fathers of the Republic, and when we and those who are to succeed us in this duty shall have accomplished this good work, then you will hear in this land no more the cry of distress, no more the appeal to Congress to enact legislation which may restore labor to its rights.

All legislation which interferes with the natural distribution of property robs labor of its rights, and it is this kind of legislation which we are here to undo. The efforts of the Committee of Ways and Means in this direction, even if they go but one step forward in the reduction of taxation, are to be commended and supported by all the intelligent men of this House who feel that the laboring classes are suffering and are entitled to relief. And let it never be forgotten that the only door that can be opened for their relief is through the reduction of taxation and such security to capital as will inspire confidence for its application to useful enterprises.

Mr. Chairman, in order that it may be understood what it is possible for us to do in the direction of economy and reduction of taxation and how far we have departed from the frugality of the Government before the late civil war occurred, I have constructed a table which gives a history of the expenditures of this Government in 1850, between 1860 and 1870, and in 1877, the last fiscal year:

Statement showing various expenditures of the United States Government during the fiscal years 1850, 1860 to 1870, and 1877, and the amount per capita.

* These are the figures for 1871.

I find that in 1850 the expenditures of this Government upon its four great departments of expenditure—the civil and miscellaneous, the War, the Navy, and the Indian Departments—amounted to $1.52 per head; that in 1860 the expenditure had risen to $1.87 per head; that at the close of the war in 1865 it was $34.60 per head; that in 1870, long after the war had closed, five years afterward, the expenditure was $3.63 per head, nearly double the amount in 1860; and finally, in 1877, after the large reduction which had been made prior to 1874 by the party then in power and the more ample reductions made since by the Forty-fourth Congress, the rate per head had been reduced to $2.46. There still remains a margin of possible reduction between $1.87 per head in 1860 and $2.46 per head in 1877. This reduction of fifty-nine cents per head, if it could be effected would reduce our appropriation bills to the extent of $25,000,000. This is the margin for reduction presented to us, the minimum amount which we can and ought to save to the people of this country. The Forty-fourth Congress did save about $20,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon; it will not amount to twelve millions.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is nothing like facts——

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I want.

Mr. WILSON, (to Mr. FOSTER.) You admit a reduction of $12,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. About twelve millions.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I find I have not at hand a statement of the expenditures of 1877. My colleague [Mr. BEEBE] had a copy which he quoted in his speech; but the reductions for the year 1877, as shown by the report of the Treasury Department, are over $20,000,000 upon the expenditure in the year 1876.

Mr. FOSTER. But that does not take into account the deficiencies. Let us be entirely fair in this matter.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman does not seem to know that what he calls deficiencies were charged up in the expenditures and appear as such in each year, so that my statement is correct; for if they did not appear as expenditures they would not be deficiencies.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, the gentleman is very much mistaken, as I can show and will show when I have the opportunity to take the floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman has taken that opportunity very often, and is perfectly welcome to take it again. I only propose to show that notwithstanding what we have done in the way of reduction, whether it be $12,000,000 or $20,000,000, there still remains a saving of $25,000,000 to be effected in the expenditures of this Government, and if the Committee on Appropriations fail to make this reduction they fail to do their duty. I find by reference to the table of expenditures in Spofford's American Almanac, that in 1877 the reduction of expenditures over 1876 was $23,320,000. So far as deficiencies are concerned they occur every year, and it is easy to show that those which existed prior to 1877 were far greater than those which were made that year.

Now we have to deal with the Army bill. The Army expenditures, as they appear by the table of expenditures of the Treasury Department, were, in 1860, fifty cents per head on our population; in 1877 they were eighty cents per head. There therefore appears to be an opportunity to save thirty cents per head in the expenditures for the Army. This would amount to a very large sum—thirteen or fourteen million dollars.

But this statement includes as expenditures of the War Department all the expenditures for rivers and harbors, for fortifications, for various engineering and other works throughout the country. I have therefore carefully analyzed the expenditures of the War Department in 1860 and in 1877, and by this analysis (in which I have had the aid of the Quartermaster's Department) I find that the actual expenditure in maintaining the Army in 1860 was forty-five cents per head; in 1877, fifty-four and seven-tenths cents per head. There is therefore a margin of possible reduction of nine and seven-tenths cents per head—a little less than ten cents per head.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether the pay of our soldiers was not greater in 1877 than in 1860?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The pay of our soldiers is greater to-day than in 1860; and I propose in dealing with this subject to say how much saving we can properly make without touching the pay of the soldiers. This saving of nine and seven-tenths cents per head, if it can be effected, will amount to about $4,500,000.

In framing the bill the committee decided to come as near that limit as they could, without impairing the efficiency of the Army or subjecting the people to any loss in other directions. It was conceded at the outset that the pay of the rank and file ought not to be touched; and it has not been touched. The bill which we have framed effects a saving of $3,871,000 upon the expenditure of the last fiscal year; and it effects that saving without touching the pay of the soldier, without touching the pay of the officer, without reducing a musket which is to-day in service. It effects it simply by a better organization of our Army. The saving is effected in administration; and that is the direction in which the Committee on Appropriations can properly proceed. They have simply eliminated useless expenditures; and they have left a system which, so far as I and others can judge, (and I shall produce their testimony,) will make our Army more effective, more manageable, and less expensive, without doing any other injustice to any human being than is inseparable from every work of reform. In this case it has been reduced to a minimum, and we have gone so far in some instances as to suspend the operation of the reformatory provisions out of regard to the feelings of officers who have deserved well of their country.

HOSTILITY TO THE ARMY.

There has been an attempt made most industriously during the last two or three years to pervert all attempts to effect reduction in the Army into evidence of hostility against the Army. And it is openly charged that this hostility is on the democratic side of the House; that we are the enemies of the Army and e converso the friends of the Army are on the other side of the House. It would be a sufficient answer to this charge to point to the fact that no reduction of the Army has ever yet been made since the war except by a republican Congress; that any attempt to touch it since the democrats came into power in this House has been resisted and defeated. If therefore reduction of the Army is evidence of hostility, then the gentlemen on the other side are the ones who have been the enemies of the Army. And whatever there is wrong in the organization of the Army—and I shall show you by the testimony of great Army officers it is very wrong—whatever there is wrong in it is due to the legislation which has been brought into this House from that side of the House, supported by gentlemen on that side of the House, who enacted it by their votes.

Among the most conspicuous gentlemen in this attack upon the democratic party and in this misrepresentation of them as the enemies of the Army, is, I am sorry to say, my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whom I am now glad to see in his seat. That gentleman in a report which was brought into the House in 1869 recommended reorganization, very properly, very wisely, and with his usual ability. And here let me say in any criticism I may now make upon what he has seen fit to give to the public, it is dictated only by a desire to get the exact truth. For I say here, as I have said elsewhere, that gentleman has no greater admirer in this country than I am. I have read his speeches on financial questions and his budget speeches, so to call them, with great admiration and instruction, and I do not think in our congressional history there have been more able, more profound, and more useful contributions to economy than the gentleman from Ohio has made.

I quote now from the gentleman's article in the May-June number of the North American Review, of the present year 1878, page 463. He says:

> It is evident that during the last three years there has been manifested in Congress a growing spirit of unfriendliness, if not of positive hostility, toward the Army.

Did the gentleman find any evidence of hostility or unfriendliness when, in 1870, the Army was cut down and when its officers were mustered out without any other pay or compensation than a year's allowance? Where has the democratic party proposed to turn these officers adrift without an adequate compensation or against their own free will?

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. The passage he has read does not say the democratic party; it does not say the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will bring it nearer home if the gentleman will allow me to proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not quit fair therefore.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am willing to concede to the gentleman a very great desire to improve the Army, and I shall quote from him to prove the necessity of the legislation which this committee has brought in. He is my authority for them. Therefore I concede to him an honest desire to improve the Army.

But he says that he has made no charge upon the democratic party. I suppose, then, when he says there has been manifested in Congress a growing spirit of unfriendliness, if not of positive hostility, a part of it is on his side. Is that so? He says it is not a charge on the democratic party; he says it is in Congress. I ask him to answer whether his side is unfriendly to the Army?

Mr. GARFIELD. No doubt it is true, in several Congresses there has been a spirit or desire to reduce the Army on both sides. If in the last three years that spirit has grown, it belongs to those who have manifested it, and to whatever party they belong.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman does not answer the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, it is more particularly on the gentleman's side than on ours.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman a moment ago said he had made no charge against the democratic party.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understood him to make such a charge, and now I will prove it by quoting further. He says:

> At the present session one of the smaller appropriation bills which usually passes without opposition was made the occasion of a fierce and bitter attack upon the Military Academy, an institution which for seventy-five years has been the fountain of military honor, has given to our soldiers a thorough and liberal culture, and has filled the Army with a spirit of national patriotism; * * * yet when the bill for its support came before the House it was violently assailed and its passage was long delayed.

And then, further quoting the passage in regard to the prohibition of confederate officers receiving commissions in the Army, he adds:

> While this section remains unrepealed the new Army to be created when our present Army should be disbanded could not be officered by those who served in the late confederate army.

Hinc illæ lacrimæ.

Now, if this does not amount to a charge of hostility to the Army on the democratic side of the House, then I am incapable of understanding the force of language. Again it was a charge which no southern member with any self-respect could answer. It amounted to an assertion that the southern members had deliberately concerted a plan to break up the Army in order that in the reorganization they might appropriate the emoluments and honors to themselves.

I repeat that is a charge which no southern man ought to answer. But the gentleman will not pretend that when the West Point bill was under consideration there were not democrats to make the defense of that institution which had given to this country so much of its military glory and had inspired the patriotism which existed North as well as South. That answer was made then and there, and it is unfair for any gentleman to go before the country in a deliberate article charging upon the democratic side the desire to disband the Army and to destroy the West Point institution, or to make what I conceive a much more reprehensible insinuation, that there may be gentlemen here who desire to destroy the Army in order that they might get commissions in a recreated Army.

Now I say with all due respect to the gentleman from Ohio that he has descended from that high plane of statesmanship where I like to see him stand to the level of a partisan, willing to make political capital out of the enforced silence of a large number of the members of this House. But I will tell the gentleman that while there is no hostility to the Army upon the democratic side of the House there has been, and is, and I trust ever will be, a strong feeling of hostility on the part of the people of this country, especially of those who are concerned for the perpetuity of free institutions, against the use to which the Army was put by the late Administration in keeping the Southern States under military subjection, and in controlling the elections so as to prevent a free expression of the will of the people. For that use the Army was not responsible, and no fair man would seek to punish them for the sins of an Administration which has received the just condemnation of the people, and whose policy in this respect has been abandoned by its successors, notwithstanding the fact that they have reaped the rewards of the abuse of the Army and to-day occupy positions to which they were never chosen by the people of this country. I think I do not go too far in saying that the spirit of the Army rebelled against the nefarious use to which it was put, and that it would rather be wiped out of existence than again to be subjected to such humiliating service.

ECONOMY.

But this consideration has had no possible influence upon the framing of this bill. The only motive of the committee has been to introduce economy, so much needed in the administration of the Army; and the only question is whether this is the time when such reduction ought to be made. The war ceased in 1865. We have had thirteen years of peace. The gentleman from Ohio, in one of the ablest speeches I have ever read, delivered in this House on the 23d of January, 1872, undertook to investigate when the excessive expenditures caused by the war should come to an end; in other words, when we should get back to the level of peace expenditures; and after a very careful discussion he makes the following statement:

DURATION OF WAR EXPENDITURES.

> Throughout our history there may be seen a curious uniformity in the movement of the annual expenditures for the years immediately following a war. We have not the data to determine how long it was after the war of Independence before the expenditures ceased to decrease, that is, before they reached the point where their natural growth more than balanced the tendency to reduction of war expenditure; but in the years immediately following all our subsequent wars, the decrease has continued for a period almost exactly twice the length of the war itself.

After the war of 1812-'15, the expenditures continued to decline for eight years, reaching the lowest point in 1823.

After the Seminole war, which ran through three years, 1836, 1837, and 1838, the new level was not reached until 1844, six years after its close.

After the Mexican war, which lasted two years, it took four years, until 1852, to reach the new level of peace.

WHEN SHALL WE REACH OUR NEW LEVEL OF EXPENDITURES?

It is perhaps unsafe to base our calculations for the future on these analogies; but the wars already referred to have been of such varied character, and their financial effects have been so uniform as to make it not unreasonable to expect that a similar result will follow our late war. If so, the decrease of our ordinary expenditures, exclusive of the principal and interest of the public debt, will continue until 1875 or 1876.

Now, I concur absolutely in all that is said here. I am convinced by the gentleman's argument that by 1876 at the latest we ought to have been back to the level of peace expenditures. Nevertheless, so far as the Army is concerned, we are not back to the level of peace expenditures in 1877 by the sum of four and one-half millions of dollars. I therefore conclude that one of the causes of grievance against the republican party which found expression in 1874 throughout the length and breadth of this land was that they did not fulfill their promise of bringing down the expenditures of the Government to the peace level as rapidly as they ought to have been brought.

And I say now to my democratic friends that if they do not bring down the expenditures to the peace level, they in like manner will and ought to be put into a minority, and some other party, whether you call it republican or national or by whatsoever name it may be known, will be put into this House to enforce this economy. The very existence of the country depends upon it, and there can be no possible revival of prosperity so long as all the profits of industry are absorbed in running the mere machinery of Government.

The question is, how shall this economy be made? Shall it be by reduction in the numbers of the rank and file of the Army? Shall it be by cutting off useless and superfluous officers in the organization? Shall it be by reduction of pay? In some way it must be done. The public demand it and they have a right to have that demand heeded.

SIZE OF THE ARMY.

In regard to the size of the Army there are some tests which may be applied. The first is the test of past experience and the second is the test of present use. Now let us first consider the test of past experience. In 1860 this country had an adequate Army by common consent. That Army was composed of 11,848 men and 1,083 officers. Now, the population in 1860 was 31,000,000. In 1878, by the estimate of the Statistical Bureau, it is 46,200,000. It is therefore about 50 per cent. greater than it was in 1860. We should therefore have an Army by the test of population not exceeding 1,624 officers and 17,772 men. What have we got? We have got an Army that contains 2,161 officers, a surplus of 537, exclusive of 300 officers on the retired list. We have an Army theoretically of 25,000 men, giving a surplus of 7,228 men. That is the result of the test by population.

Now we come to the test of use. My friend from Ohio has very elaborately considered that test in these articles—and it has been elsewhere considered—and the strong argument used is always the extent of frontier. They say that since 1860 the frontier lines of this country have been enormously increased. And so they have. I have seen it stated that they are ten times as great as they were in 1860. This is an exaggeration, but nevertheless we will admit that there is a much larger frontier line to be protected. Now, what is the test of protection for the frontier line? Not miles. It is the number of posts which are maintained on the frontier line, because the Government plants a post wherever there are incursions of Indians to be resisted and wherever there are settlers to be protected. Now, on the test of posts in 1860, according to the gentleman from Ohio, there were 94 posts, but according to the statement which I have had from the War Department there were 77 posts. In 1877, by the report of the Secretary of War, which is clearly erroneous, there are 224 posts. The gentleman from Ohio gives the number at 161. The Quartermaster's Department, which has to supply these posts and care for them, tell me there are 163 posts. The proportion, therefore, is as 77 to 163. But in answer to a resolution of this House the Secretary of War has just transmitted a statement from General Sherman (House of Representatives, Executive Document No. 79, Forty-fifth Congress, second session) showing the number of posts that are no longer of any use and that may be abandoned. I have collated and will put in a table which I will append to my remarks the number of these posts for which the Army officers say there is no use. They amount to 53.

C.

Posts that can be abandoned.

Character.	Name.	Department.	By whom recommended.
Forts	Sully and Rice, (in case the agencies are abandoned, then the temporary posts of New Red Cloud and New Spotted Tail.)	Dakota	Sheridan.

C.—Posts that can be abandoned—Continued.

Character.	Name.	Department.	By whom recommended.
Forts	Hartsuff and Bridger	Platte	Sheridan.
	Larned, Garland, Union, Selden, Craig.	Missouri	Do.
	Richardson, Griffin	Texas	Do.
Camps	Stambaugh, North Platte Station, Sheridan. (?)	Platte	Do.
Forts	Lyon, Wallace, Hays, Harker, Craig, McRae.	Missouri	Pope.
Recruiting depot	David's Island, New York Harbor	Atlantic	Hancock.
Forts	Standish, Andrew, Sewall	do	Do.
	Mackinac, Niagara, (in peace,) Ontario.	East	Fry.
Barracks	Madison, Plattsburg, Carlisle, (arsenal at Washington. (?)	do	Do.
Forts	Wayne, Gratiot, Brady, Porter, Preble, Independence, Warren, Adams, Trumbull, Hamilton, Wadsworth, Schuyler, McHenry, Foote, Monroe, (should not be given up, but need not be garrisoned in time of peace unless used as quarters.)	do	Fry.
Barracks	Baton Rouge, Little Rock, Mount Vernon.	Gulf	Augur.
	Newport, (Kentucky,) Chattanooga	South	Ruger.
Camp	Independence, McDermit, (possibly.) Harney, (if the agency is moved,) Grant, Lowell, (if another post can be established in Southern Mexican frontier.)

If these be deducted from the number in existence there would be left 110 posts and the ratio therefore would be as 77 to 110.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will see the justice, before making his comparison, of finding out how many posts could have been dispensed with in 1860 and then comparing the necessary number in 1860 with the necessary number in 1878 or else the actual number in 1860 and the actual number in 1877.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I admit that it would be desirable that we should have that information.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is necessary, of course.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am sorry that I have not got it, and the gentleman from Ohio does not supply it.

Mr. MARSH. It is also necessary, in order that the House may understand the bill, that the gentleman should state the number of posts, new additional posts, which the Department recommend the establishment of.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If my good friend will only wait a little longer, he will have all that information. I have done my best, and I hope that the gentlemen who do me the honor to listen to me will give me credit for having endeavored to obtain all the information I could in reference to these matters. My only object is to get at the facts and the exact truth. If the country really needs a larger Army, I would be the first man to vote for it. I only wish to state the facts so that the House may know them when they come to act upon the details of the bill.

The number of new posts recommended, so far as I have been able to ascertain, does not exceed 10, and that would make 120 posts needed in order properly to protect the frontier. If that be so, then the number of posts that ought to be kept up and those that ought to be established are about 60 per cent. more than the number that existed in 1860, and upon that basis of comparison with the Army of 1860, an Army of 20,000 men now would be amply sufficient for all purposes.

Now, then, some other arguments have been urged why we should have a large standing army—I mean larger than we now have. The first is the argument in regard to Indian wars. What I have to say as to that is, that the danger from Indian wars is measured in the same manner as I have tried to measure the size of the Army; it is to be measured by the number of posts established to protect the frontier from the incursions of the Indians. But it is pretty safe to assume that we are to have no more great Indian wars. Two years ago General Sheridan, in a dispatch which was cordially indorsed by General Sherman in his annual report, said, speaking of General Crook's expedition:

If successful, of which I do not doubt, the Sioux war, and all other Indian wars in this country of any magnitude, will be over forever.

Notwithstanding this prediction, however, the past year was marked by the war with the Nez Percés under Chief Joseph. You all know the result of that struggle, and that it was carried on with a very small force. Now, so far as I have been able to survey the field, there is to-day no considerable demonstration either made or expected from these Indians. They are practically subdued. Within the last few days Sitting Bull, as I have been informed, has opened negotiations for terms upon which he may return and go upon some one of the reservations which are assigned to the Indians by the Government.

Mr. McCOOK. I understand the gentleman to say that Chief Joseph was captured by a very small force.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; not a large one.

Mr. McCOOK. I presume the gentleman knows that he was followed by General Howard for over eighteen hundred miles with one detachment, was intercepted at another point by General Gibbon, and finally captured by General Miles, and the whole force amounted to fifteen hundred men.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I say in regard to that that I would not take away one of the soldiers from the frontier, nor is there any provision in this bill which makes it necessary to do so. They were able to do their work and to do it well; under what enormous difficulties they did it I know as well as my colleague from New York, and I admit that if the organization of the Army had been different and the companies full the loss of life on our side would have been much less and the Indian campaign would have been brought to a speedier close.

The trouble is, as I will show later on in my argument, that the organization of the Army left these gallant officers without a sufficient number of men needed in the hour of trial.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I find that this bill makes an appropriation of only $50,000 for recruiting purposes, while the bill proposes to reduce the Army. Why does the gentleman reduce it and make no sufficient appropriation for recruiting, if he complains that the companies are too small?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am willing to give an opportunity to anybody to ask me questions for information, but if these interruptions are to be taken out of my time, it is quite evident that I shall not be able to complete the statement which I desire to make to the House, but I will say now that the sum of $50,000 for recruiting purposes is deemed sufficient by the War Department, on the basis of the bill as reported.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The estimates show that they need $100,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But the estimates have been revised to meet the basis of 20,000 men; hence $50,000 will be sufficient.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The amended estimates do not show that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not think that any greater number of troops than we now have will be necessary in order to resist attacks from the Indians. If I thought there were I would cheerfully vote for an increase, but I think that gentlemen who study the question will find in the reports of General Sheridan and General Sherman and other generals who have charge of these matters that an increase in the number of troops is not necessary, but that a reorganization of the system on which they are handled is most necessary.

STRIKES AND COMMUNISM.

Now we are told that we ought to have a large Army, and a very large Army, in order to put down impending strikes. I take issue with that proposition. It is not in accordance with the theory of this Government that the United States is to maintain an Army for the purpose of restraining any portion of its citizens in their just rights. The right to strike is a just right. No man can coerce another to do work against his will. It is just as sacred a right as the right to employ if you can find somebody who is willing to hire himself out to you. The wisdom of strikes is quite another matter, and it is to be hoped that in this country strikes as well as lock-outs will be avoided by conciliation on both sides, for they are equally mischievous and destructive.

But I will be told that strikes result in disorder. So, unhappily, they have heretofore; so they will again. But it forms no part of the duty of the National Government to repress or to check such disorders. In the first place it is the duty of the police, where there is one; where there is no police it is the duty of the sheriff; and where the sheriff is unable to check disorder it is the duty of the State to do it.

It was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the States should not only be sovereign within their own limits, but that they should maintain order within their own limits, and, if they fail to do so, that they should and must take the consequences. The provision of the Constitution which gives authority to the General Government to furnish troops and give assistance in case of insurrection was intended only as a last resort, where the State had done its full duty in maintaining a police and a citizen soldiery and had found itself overpowered.

That has never happened in this country. In any State which has done its duty there has never been an insurrection which the State could not put down. But there are States in this Union who have neglected to do their duty. They learned a lesson and they received a warning last year which I think they have taken to heart. It is their business to protect order within their own limits, and it forms no part of the business of the General Government to supply by its power, any neglect on the part of the States to do the duty which they reserved to themselves under the provisions of the Constitution.

What this Government may do, and what I am free to say it ought to do, is to avail itself of another provision of the Constitution which I think, requires it to organize a national militia system throughout the country. One of the things we can do, even if we fall short of our duty in that particular, is by some legislation within our constitutional power to give encouragement to rifle clubs, sharp-shooting clubs throughout the length and breadth of this land.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. There are too many of them now in some parts of the country.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No citizen should be allowed to grow up in this country who cannot handle a gun. You never need fear disorders where the people bear arms. They never will turn those arms against the constituted authorities. There is no motive in this country for the people to attack the State governments. They understand that the State governments protect their property and their rights, and that the true and effectual remedy for grievances of any kind is in ballots and not in bullets.

Communism which is flaunted before us as a reason why we should add ten thousand, twenty thousand, ay, fifty thousand men to our Army, never has had a footing in this land, never will have unless we undertake to police it with a standing army; and then you will have communists in every town in this country. In France communism had existence only when they had a despotic government upheld by a standing army. When free institutions were introduced in France communism perished. It is dead in France to-day.

If gentlemen have any desire to pursue that subject, which I have not the time now to follow up, but which I have carefully studied, they will find, in an article written by Mr. Fred. Harrison in the Fortnightly Review for May, a statement that at the late convention of the socialistic and labor classes of France, held at Lyons, they proved themselves to be as conservative in reference to all rights of property as any other class in the community, as they are in England and as they have always been in this country. They merely insisted that the economic relations of society are not in a healthy state, and that they must be transformed in the future if civilization is to advance, and to this proposition I subscribe with all my heart.

I will tell you what produces communism—what will produce it anywhere: excessive taxation; this engine of taxation which takes away from labor its earnings and gives them to a favored class, making the condition of the laboring-man hopeless; that will produce communism. The instincts of humanity rebel against utter and hopeless poverty; and when the power of accumulation is taken away from the laboring classes they will make the "voice as of one crying in the wilderness" heard, even in these Halls; but it will be through the peaceful agency of universal suffrage, which is the sanctuary of labor.

If you have a great standing Army in this country you have got to pay for it; the working industry of the country has got to pay for it. Their sufferings will go on increasing from day to day until they will break out into revolution. No man who has studied history and philosophy or who is familiar with the principles of justice will say that they will not be justified in doing so when they are deprived of the fruits of their honest labor. But the revolution here will be peaceful, but effectual because it is peaceful.

Now, if you want to fan communism, increase your standing Army and you will have enough of it. If you want to have it flourish here, as it has flourished in France and taken refuge in Germany, where there is a military system, you have only to distrust the people and proclaim that you intend to maintain order by the creation of a large standing Army, to be under the direction and control of the President.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. What is the standing army in France to-day?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It is over 600,000 men.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. How is it, then, that communism does not flourish there?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Prior to the Franco-German war the people of France had no means of securing just legislation. To-day France is a republic. Every man who was a communist feels now that the security of his rights is in the ballot-box. He had not that security before. He looks now to peaceful, not violent, remedies for whatever wrongs may exist.

If the gentleman asks me whether an army of 600,000 men is not a wrong, I answer that it is a wrong so vast, so immeasurable, that to me it is the miracle of the ages, that any nation can endure it and not be reduced to absolute starvation. It is against the growth of that system in this country that I protest, and I want to meet it at the very outset. I want to provide as large an army as is necessary to discharge every obligation of the National Government. I do not want to have a single man beyond that number, or for a purpose which was never contemplated in the Constitution, and which never can be contemplated, so long as we continue to believe in the principles of self-government on which it is based.

Gentlemen will say "Suppose an insurrection breaks out, what are we to do?" Why, sir, that is provided for by law. Section 5297 of the Revised Statutes gives the President the right to call out the militia of any State where disorder prevails, or of the surrounding States:

> In case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.—Revised Statutes, section 5297.

But I am told the militia will sympathize with the "mob," as it is the fashion to call these people. I do not believe it. I do not believe so ill of my countrymen. I do not believe they are so ignorant of the rights and duties of citizenship. If they are, then this whole Government is founded on a delusion and a snare. Our people do not sympathize with disorder or violence. But if they do, what is the logical conclusion? That we must govern by absolutism? Is this country prepared to accept that conclusion? If we cannot trust our citizen soldiers, our people, who are in the main property owners—who have genuine communism and have had it for a hundred years in the fact that they either all own or may own property if they are industrious and prudent—if it has come to this that you cannot trust the people, then republican institutions are a failure; and when you provide an army to do the work of the people of the several States—of the owners of property, the honest and industrious laborers—when you have done that you have registered the decree of death against this Republic. For one, I protest that the time has not yet been reached for making such a humiliating confession as would be implied in legislation for the creation of a gigantic national police.

I find that the regular army of France is 470,000, instead of 600,000, as I stated.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It makes but little difference—no difference as to the principle.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. None at all. But it is well to observe just here that the number of troops who were moved in order to quell the disturbances of last year on the call of the governors of the several States was 6,391, as appears by the report of the Adjutant-General; not more, in fact, than had been habitually employed for several years previously in protecting the people of the Southern States against themselves, and preserving the balance of power in Washington. No doubt it would have been convenient to have controlled a larger number, but the emergency was unexpected in the States, but should henceforth be anticipated and provided for in the regular way.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Now, having, as I think, fairly met all the arguments in favor of the necessity for any larger Army than we now have, I proceed to consider the question of the organization of the present Army and what are the abuses in connection with it that need a remedy.

In the article of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be found a concise history of the reduction of the Army. I have not time to go into that question here; but I may say that it was reduced in 1866 to 50,000 men and 3,036 officers; it was reduced again in 1869 to 35,000 men; in 1870 it was brought down to 30,000 men and 2,161 officers; and by the appropriation bill of 1874 it was reduced to 25,000 men, without any further reduction of officers. A reduction of officers was made in 1870, but one which confessedly was totally inadequate. I refer gentlemen who desire to follow up this matter to a speech of General Logan on this subject, which will be found in the Congressional Globe for 1869-'70, Appendix, volume 81, page 146. In that speech General Logan explicitly declares that what he then proposed to do was only a beginning of what ought to be done. I will read just a passage or two which I have my eye on:

Now, sir, I will state to the House that in preparing our bill, we have not fully reorganized the Army as we think it should be, nor have we curtailed it near as much as it ought to be curtailed, as I will demonstrate to the satisfaction of every member on this floor who will give me his attention. But we have done that which we thought Congress would accept now, and if further curtailment is deemed necessary, as I believe, and as the committee over which I have the honor to preside as chairman also believe, that may be done hereafter. But we thought this would be sufficient for the present, and perhaps it is all we can do in face of the opposition we are receiving from some quarters, for reasons unknown to us.

It seems that they had opposition in those days just as we have now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has expired.

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the Committee of the Whole will extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. SPARKS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not be limited.

Mr. WILSON. Let him have an hour more.

A MEMBER. Let him finish his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from New York proceeding.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking under great difficulty. My throat is in such a condition as scarcely to allow me to speak. If I had these remarks written, I should not avail myself of the courtesy of the committee, but ask leave to print them; but unhappily I have had no time to write them. I am therefore speaking solely from notes; and unless I conclude my statement, I fear a proper explanation of this bill may not be made.

Now, here was the declaration of General Logan that he and his committee had not gone far enough in the reorganization of the Army. In 1874, by what is known as the "Coburn bill," the rank and file of the Army were reduced to 25,000; but nothing was done with the officers. Previous to that time complaints had come in from all quarters that the number of regiments was too large for the number of men; that the regiments contained so few men as to be very ineffective in war. There were actually companies that had no men because they were detailed for other duties. Yet in the face of this state of things the Army was reduced to the extent of 5,000 men, but not a single officer was put out. What was the result? The whole structure became top-heavy. It was all officers, all epaulets—no men, no muskets. Of course I speak in extremes; but the fact is notorious, and no gentlemen on this floor will pretend to deny it, that our Army is over-officered. It is an inverted cone. What we propose to do is to restore this cone to its base.

THE SKELETON SYSTEM.

And here let me say that I have asked every Army officer whom I have met: "Are you satisfied with the condition of the Army?" "No." "What is the matter?" "There are too few men in the regiments; there are too few men in the companies." What is their remedy? "Fill it up to forty thousand men." Without exception every man has said that to me: "Give us forty thousand men." "What," I say, "are you not in favor of the skeleton system?" "No, we are not in favor of the skeleton system."

I will pursue that line of my argument at this time, although it belongs to a later period of the discussion, because I may not be able to complete it. I have been met through the newspapers and elsewhere with the criticism of this bill, that it destroys the skeleton system of the Army. It does destroy the skeleton system. I acknowledge it. It ought to destroy the skeleton system, and I quote the General of the Army, General Sheridan, and General Hancock, as my authorities against the skeleton system.

Mr. McCOOK. Will my colleague quote General Schofield in that same connection?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will quote him if my colleague will furnish me with the quotation.

Mr. McCOOK. He can find it. Is that the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, it is not; it is the report of the Secretary of War, containing the report of the General of the Army.

Mr. McCOOK. I do not know where General Hancock testifies as my colleague indicates.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will read it to the gentleman in a few moments. If he had consulted his friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] he would have found that gentleman had quoted it at great length in his article from which I shall read.

Mr. McCOOK. That was several years ago, following the war.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, not at all; it is the present year.

Mr. McCOOK. The gentleman refers to the magazine article.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANNING. Printed in connection with the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir. It is quoted in General GARFIELD's article. I only want to give the facts, and if there is anything on the other side, if gentlemen will send it to me, I will quote that too.

To proceed, General Sheridan, in speaking of this Indian campaign, says:

The expense and very great loss of life attending these operations have arisen principally from being obliged to use an inadequate force to perform services which to accomplish quickly and properly required at least double its numbers. If the companies had been filled to one hundred men each the additional expense would not have been so great in the end as it has now proved to be with companies ranging from thirty to forty men. Then the Indian troubles might have been settled promptly, and there is a strong probability that they would not have occurred at all; and I therefore respectfully recommend an increase of all the companies in the service to one hundred men each. I believe it would be true economy and at the same time it would enable the Army to satisfactorily perform the work required of it.

Then comes General Sherman, who says:

I agree with General Sheridan perfectly in what he states, and further, that our weakness is well known to the Indians, our inveterate enemy, the enemy to cultivation, to labor of any sort, and to all civilization, and that this very weakness entails on the General Government the great cost of Indian wars.

And next I come to the Adjutant-General of the Army, who, on page 47 of the report of the Secretary of War, submits the draft of a law for increasing the Army. He says:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, September 10, 1877.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal instructions I have the honor to submit the following report on the best mode of increasing the strength of the regular Army:

From a very early day the military history of this country contains records of disasters due solely to the "skeleton" organization of companies. Dade's massacre may be cited, for the sake of a commencement as to dates, and Gibbon's late affair with the Nez Percés as the most recent. Gibbon had six companies in all, numbering 15 officers and 146 men. His companies averaged about 24 men each. With this handful of men he inflicted a severe loss on an enemy treble his numbers. If his companies had averaged 80 men he would have outnumbered Joseph's band and would probably have captured or exterminated it. The reason Gibbon had so small a force was that Congress decreed there should be but 25,000 enlisted men in all the Army, and that 7 regiments of cavalry should have 100 men per company, or 1,202 to a regiment; the other 3 cavalry regiments 70 per company, or 845 to a regiment; and that the remainder should be divided between the engineer, artillery, and infantry companies and ordnance and general service detachments. The following schedule, showing the division which was made under this law, will explain why companies of artillery and infantry are so small.

Therefore General Townsend says the skeleton system is a failure and has been productive of enormous losses to this country. He follows that statement up in these words:

To bring the Army down to the standard of 25,000, in accordance with the terms of the act of August 15, 1876, the following is the standard fixed for all organizations except cavalry:

Enlisted men of engineers	200
Enlisted men of ordnance	350
Ordnance sergeants at posts	114
Commissary sergeants at posts	148
Hospital stewards	200

West Point detachments	200
Recruiting parties	300
Indian scouts	600
Guard at military prison	74
Sixty-five enlisted men per battery for 5 light batteries of artillery	325
Forty-eight enlisted men per battery for 5 light batteries at the artillery school	240
Thirty-eight enlisted men per battery for 50 batteries of artillery, and 5 enlisted men for non-commissioned staff at each of 5 regimental headquarters of artillery	1,925
Thirty-seven enlisted men per company of 250 companies of infantry, and 5 for non-commissioned staff, at each of 25 regimental headquarters of infantry	9,375

In the first article of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in the March-April number of the North American Review for 1878, which he has kindly handed to me, he says:

In discussing the condition of the infantry and cavalry, General Hancock calls attention to the fact that the number of enlisted men in each company had become too small for effective discipline and instruction, so that in late years it has not been practicable to carry military instruction beyond the school of the individual soldier or rarely beyond the school of the company. To remedy this evil, he recommends that the companies in these arms of the service be filled up to 100 men each, and, to prevent the aggregate increase of the Army which this would occasion, he recommends that the number of companies in each regiment be reduced to eight. The General (Hancock) then continues: "The question of any further reduction of these arms than that just suggested should, I think, be deferred a few years longer, until our Indian frontiers are in a more settled condition. If no other disturbances have arisen, I have no doubt that these arms could with safety be still further reduced if then deemed advisable."

I think that this quotation substantially answers the question which was put to me a little while ago by my colleague from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK,] whether I could point to any statement of General Hancock on the subject of the increase of the Army above 25,000 men. Now, he not only does not recommend an increase, but suggests an ultimate reduction. And the suggestion which he makes of increasing the number of men in the companies by reducing the number of companies in the regiment has been adopted in the bill under discussion.

I regret that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has not seen fit to publish the whole of General Hancock's letter, but from the following extract which is given it is evident that he proposed reductions and consolidations in all branches of the service. General Hancock says:

A considerable saving of expense would result from the reductions and consolidations proposed in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry. The concentration of enlisted men so as to have fewer and larger companies would be a departure from the old theory that our Army in peace, especially the line, should be a skeleton to be filled out for war. This theory, false in principle, has always failed in practice.

I suppose my colleague will now be satisfied as to General Hancock.

Mr. MCCOOK. I will if you read on.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am going to read the rest of it. I will read the whole of it, and I think it will fully satisfy my colleague as to the "skeleton" system.

It involves just that lack of power so much complained of during peace—companies too small for instruction, drill, and other duty—and when war comes, in lieu of filling out the skeleton, we take entire new organizations from the volunteers or militia. Our standing Army should be a small, complete, compact, vigorous, healthy body; always in a thorough state of discipline and instruction, serving as a model and a standard for the national forces, and not preserved as a skeleton, into which it is expected to infuse vitality, activity, and knowledge at the moment an emergency arises.

Does my colleague want any more from General Hancock?

Now, he alludes to a fact which ought to be known to every man who writes an article for a newspaper in this country, that we never have filled out one of these skeletons. When trouble came we called for the volunteers and they came. In every war we ever had we have never undertaken to fill out skeletons. We have organized additional armies out of the volunteer force.

Mr. MCCOOK. I do not like to interrupt my colleague; but I must ask him this: will he put his finger on anything General Hancock has ever written that looks toward a reduction or consolidation of the regimental organization?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The number of regiments?

Mr. MCCOOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am not prepared to put my finger on anything other than I have already read, which I regard as sufficient; but if the gentleman is prepared to put his finger on anything to the contrary I will yield to him that he may produce it.

Mr. MCCOOK. I cannot do so at this moment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then you must not expect me to be prepared for things you are not prepared for yourself.

Now, I have said that every officer whom I have consulted has recommended the increase of the Army by filling up the regiments. Then I have put the converse proposition. If the people of this country through their Representatives are not willing to have an Army of 40,000 men, and both sides of this House are upon record against such an Army, the republicans by reducing it from 50,000 to 40,000, to 30,000, to 25,000, and this side of the House by efforts to bring it down to 20,000—I say if the people of this country will not have such an Army what then will you do? I have yet to find the first man who has not said, "Then reduce your regimental organizations to the number adapted to the number of enlisted men you are willing to support." General Sherman says it. In the very article in which the gentleman from Ohio has discussed this subject, General Sherman recommends the consolidation. I give his recommendation, although it does not agree with what we have reported:

	Officers.	Men.
Five regiments of artillery, 60 companies	270	3,600
Ten regiments of cavalry, 120 companies	540	7,360
Twenty regiments of infantry, 240 companies	1,080	14,760
	1,890	25,760
Aggregating officers and men		27,650

General Sherman recommends five regiments of artillery, ten regiments of cavalry, and twenty regiments of infantry, reducing the number of infantry five regiments. That is his recommendation; and he figures that for an army of 25,760 men. Now, when we figure for an army of 20,000 men, we must necessarily make a further reduction on his number of regiments. But the principle is exactly the same, and the General of the Army is my authority for this proposition to consolidate regiments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I dislike to interrupt the current of the gentleman's argument; but I think he should state that General Sherman's plan is to have three battalion regiments, so that we shall have in a regiment three battalions instead of two, as now. Without that statement, General Sherman's idea is not fully represented.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I was to have come to that a little later. And I may as well state now as hereafter, that General Sherman recommends a regiment composed of three battalions. In that recommendation he is in accordance with the modern military practice. And, just at this point, let me disclaim any pretension whatever to military knowledge. I know nothing absolutely about it, and I would be the last man to undertake or attempt a reorganization of the Army, or to give an opinion on any military matter whatever. On matters of finance, of mere administration of dollars and cents, I hold myself competent to pass judgment. But when it comes to questions of organization I only quote authorities, and by recognized authorities I propose to stand.

Now, General Sherman recommends a regiment with three battalions—that is the modern military practice—two of those battalions to be in service and one of them as a skeleton battalion for reinforcing the other two. I would have said later that the bill which we have reported to this House contemplates exactly that arrangement. It provides for three battalions. It organizes two of those battalions at the present time and it leaves the third battalion to be organized whenever in the judgment of the country a larger army is necessary. Therefore the bill proposed by the committee really is the only plan of skeleton organization, which is worth anything, that has ever been proposed in this House. It does the very thing that General Sherman wants to have done, except that he proposes to keep his skeleton in existence. It is an expensive skeleton. It is a skeleton in the closet which we think in the poverty of this country at the present time it is not wise to create. But later the luxury of a skeleton may be indulged in and probably with great advantage.

Now, having arrived at the principle that the expenditure of the Army must be reduced and ought to be reduced, and having got the judgment of all the military authorities that the proper mode of reduction is to consolidate regimental organizations, the Committee on Appropriations went then to their friends on the Military Committee.

THE PLAN FOR REORGANIZATION.

The Committee on Appropriations did not pretend to know anything about military affairs; they went to the proper authority of this House, who had had the subject under consideration, and asked them to give the Committee on Appropriations a plan of reduction by which the money appropriation could be brought down within the proper limits, and we accepted the plan which the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs had matured. I am not going to defend that plan. If it is to be attacked, the gentlemen on the Committee on Military Affairs are perfectly competent to take care of their own progeny. But this I want to say, that the plan recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was accepted with three reservations, which I will now state.

Mr. MARSH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill has been passed upon and reported by the Committee on Military Affairs or has met their approbation?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not say that it was passed upon or reported by that committee, but I say this, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, that we consulted the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and asked him to give us the details of the organization which had been matured by that committee in a bill which has not been reported, probably from the fact that the committee has not been called.

Mr. MARSH. I will say that the bill to which the gentleman has referred has not been matured and has not been passed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman from New York has not reported the bill which the Committee on Military Affairs agreed to; he has made changes in it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I was about to state the changes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I desire the privilege of stating here, lest there should be any misapprehension, that this bill was never approved by the Committee on Military Affairs. I, for one, as a member of that committee, never did approve of it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will simply repeat what I said before that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by the request of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, furnished the Committee on Appropriations with a plan which we were informed met with the approbation of the majority of that committee. We took that plan with three reservations. The first was this: that we would not report any bill which reduced the number of muskets in the Army below the number which was in the Army at the date of the last report of the Adjutant-General. That was the first point. The second point was, that we would not force a single officer of the Army out of the service without his own consent; that if he did not choose to go, he should remain an officer, unless in the judgment of his fellow-officers, he was unfit to be an officer at all; in other words, for incompetency. And lastly, we declined to cut down the pay of the officers of the Army. We were willing to deal with their allowances, but were not willing to deal with their pay proper, the pay fixed by a republican Congress, by the bill known as General Logan's bill.

The pay list is absolutely untouched, so far as pay proper is concerned. What we undertake to deal with is the allowances, which General Logan undertook to cut off, but did not cut off by his bill, but by this bill we do cut off the allowances, which were abuses, with one exception, which I will state presently, in which I do not concur. But the broad proposition is true that we have not interfered with the pay proper of the Army officers in this bill, although we had the authority of General Sherman for doing so if we had been disposed to proceed in that direction. In his letter dated February 4, 1876, addressed to the Military Committee and printed in the volume of testimony published by that committee for the last Congress, General Sherman says: "I think the present salary bill for the Army is just and liberal; was supposed to be of lasting duration, and should not be materially altered till the currency comes to the gold standard, when all salaries could be reduced 15 or 20 per cent."

By the operations of the Treasury Department, under the able administration of his brother, the contingency has arrived when Army salaries might properly be reduced to a gold basis, especially as they were fixed when gold was at a premium of 16.7.

Now we come to the first proposition about the reduction of the numbers of the Army. I have a table of the Paymaster's department, signed by General Alvord, which gives the distribution of the present Army through the several ranks, from General down to private. I find that if the Army had 25,000 men in it the number of soldiers bearing guns would be 22,257. But the Army is not full. By the return made by the Adjutant-General in the last annual report of the Secretary of War there were only 19,257 men in service to carry muskets, and of these 463 men are detailed at headquarters as clerks, leaving the actual number of muskets in the service 18,794. That fixed the minimum of muskets which the Committee on Appropriations were willing to report in any bill that they might bring before this House. Now, by the table which I hold in my hand, and which will be appended to my remarks, counting all the musket-bearing men, commissioned and non-commissioned, as before, this bill will give us 18,905; in other words, it will give a number of men exceeding the present number of men by 111; but if the same number of men were detailed out of the Army, as we propose to make it, as is detailed out of the present Army, then we should have 352 muskets less than the present number. Now, as I have said, there are 463 men detailed for duty here in Washington. It is alleged that it is done for the sake of economy. I have had a statement made up which shows that the Government is paying annually from $1,000 to $1,200 for each one of these detailed men in pay and allowances.

Now, from the figures which I have given it is evident that the present Army is short of the number of muskets which are properly due to an army of 25,000 men about 3,000. If it is desired to have the full number of 22,354 muskets which the present organization permits, then it is evident that you can get this number of muskets by adding 3,000 to the number of enlisted men proposed in our bill. In other words, such is the superiority of the organization proposed by us that an Army of 23,500 enlisted men will give as many men bearing arms as the present Army of 25,000 men. The cost of these 3,000 additional men will be about $900,000, so that the organization which we propose will save $3,000,000 and give an Army as large in all respects, except in officers, and one which will be compact, complete, and perfectly effective, a "model Army," to use the words of General Hancock. How can any man who is in favor of economy refuse to deal with this question when it is demonstrated that at $3,000,000 less cost we can have practically the same number of muskets by consolidating regiments? and the regiments will not then be skeleton regiments, which are condemned by every military authority of whom I have inquired on the subject.

I say, how can any man here refuse to save these $3,000,000? I am not going to discuss the question whether 20,000, 21,000, or 23,000 men in our Army is the proper number. But I say if you gentlemen on the other side have been right in your theory that you want an army of 25,000 men, then I have shown you a way to obtain your officers and men at a less cost by $3,000,000, and I ask you to join with me in the effort to save this money.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would inquire of the gentleman in regard to the detail of men for the Signal Corps, &c.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Signal Corps is not touched by this bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Are there not now 2,500 men detached from the regular service?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. As I understand it, there are about 2,250 men who are not now carrying muskets, included in the estimate of arms-bearing men. But desiring to do full justice, I will say that I am informed at the War Department that there are only 463 of those men who are not in a position where they could bear muskets if required.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. What I wish to ask is this: how are you going to supply that deficiency?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will answer that question. I propose to have an Army that is an Army, compact, vigorous, healthy, as General Hancock says. I do not propose to take soldiers from the Army and put them in the Departments here to do the work of clerks. I say that is only to conceal the truth from the people of this country. Let us pay clerks to do clerical work and pay enlisted men to do the Army work. We save no money by detailing enlisted men for this purpose; we simply pay to each of these enlisted men $1,000 or $1,200 a year, money enough to hire a clerk, and by so doing we deceive the people as to the size of the Army. I do not propose to do that any longer.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The House refused the other day to follow the gentleman in regard to this matter of details.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I want the House to know what they are doing when they refuse to follow, when they take men from the Army and put them at other work.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will allow me on this point.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to refer the gentleman to the report of Mr. Calhoun, while he was Secretary of War, in which he said distinctly that it had been the experience of centuries that one-third of the enlisted men of the Army were necessarily absent on certain details and could not bear muskets actively.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me, his objection has no force. It applies equally to the Army in existence and to the proposed Army. The same deduction will be made in the case of any army. My point is this, and I hope he will comprehend it: that the proposed scheme puts as many men into the Army who ought to bear muskets if they are on hand as there are now bearing muskets in the present Army, when we have less than 22,000 enlisted men. If they want to have more men, then they ought to enlist more men. But of the 22,000 we have only 18,794 that could carry muskets. And under this bill we propose to give them 18,905.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman has not comprehended my question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I think I have.

Mr. CALKINS. In the proposed reorganization of the Army, will there be any less number detailed than there is in the present organization?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman apparently does not understand that I give the maximum for each army, including the details. There will always be details; there will be sick men, there will always be men in either case who cannot carry muskets. But in both cases I have given the maximum, and that is the only basis upon which the comparison can be made.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] permit me to answer the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS?]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BANNING. In the proposed reduction we will do away with 148 companies, or 14 regiments. In doing away with those 14 regiments we do away with the unnecessary detail for 10 regimental headquarters and 148 company headquarters. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is an old soldier himself, and he knows that will be a saving of over 1,000 detailed men now unnecessarily detailed.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not admit the conclusions of the gentleman——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I think this discussion can go on outside of my remarks. I desire to say that in either case there will be a deduction of about one-third; so I understand Army officers to say.

OFFICERS.

This bill proposes to reduce the number of officers 547. I have said that no one of these officers is to go out of the Army except by his free will. It is to be accomplished by this process: first, those who are willing to go are to be allowed additional pay and allowances in proportion to the length of their service, but their going is to be purely voluntary on their part. The scale of pay and allowance is liberal beyond any precedent in this country or any other in the world. If they have served ten years, they are to have one year's additional pay and allowance; if they have served fifteen years, they are to have two years' pay and allowance; if they have served twenty years, they are to have three years' pay and allowance; if they have served twenty-five years, they are to have four years' pay and allowance; and if thirty years, they are to have five years' pay and allowance.

I say in the first place that the bill provides for the voluntary retirement of officers upon a scale of compensation unprecedented for its liberality. If they do not choose to retire, as many of them will, then all over sixty-five years of age are to be placed by the President upon the retired list, where they will get 75 per cent. of their present pay and allowances. No other country in the world ever retires its military officers upon more than half pay. No one can complain, therefore, that this measure is not sufficiently liberal. A board, consisting of three major-generals of the Army, is provided to pass upon the remaining officers who will be relieved by this consolidation. All those who are incompetent or unfitted by vicious habits to be officers will be discharged. They may at the outset retire voluntarily; but if they do not take advantage of that provision, this board of three officers is to determine whether they are fit to be officers of the United States, and if not they are to be discharged, as they ought to be.

And, lastly, all the others who are faithful and competent officers are put on the supernumerary list. Out of that list all the vacancies in the service are to be filled. If there are still officers who are not required for the military service the President is empowered to employ them in the civil service of the Government until they are required for military service. There is a law now which prohibits the civil employment of officers. This bill proposes to repeal so much of that law as will interfere with this use of the supernumerary officers. Therefore we have done them no injustice. Under Logan's bill a board sat and discharged them all. There was no supernumerary list. They went with a year's pay and allowance. And General Logan defended that method in a powerful speech (which I am sorry I cannot read) by the uniform precedents of this country after the revolutionary war, after the war of 1812, and after the Mexican war, and said there never had been any complaint, and ought not to be any complaint. Under his act 504 officers were so retired from the Army. Under this act no man who is fit to be an officer will be retired unless he himself desires it.

PAY OF OFFICERS.

We come now to the subject of pay. I have said we have not reduced the pay proper. The pay proper was fixed by General Logan's bill, passed in 1870. Prior to the passage of that bill the pay of officers was a most complicated affair. I have a table here giving the comparative pay for 1860 and 1870, and it will be seen by those who examine it, (for I will print it with my remarks,) that there were at least eight different allowances made to an officer in 1860 in order to make up his pay. General Logan proposed to simplify and bring these allowances down to a fixed sum; and in order that I may not be misunderstood I propose to quote his language. It is as follows:

> The pay has increased to such an extent that it is now most extravagant. * * * The excess over the pay proper is on account of rations, forage, commutation of quarters, and everything else a man can imagine summed up together in such a way that neither you nor I could sit down and figure it out satisfactorily.
> We propose to reduce all this to a system; we propose to give each officer of the Army such pay as he is entitled to; we propose to give it by the year, a regular fixed salary.

After stating the pay proposed to be given to each grade in the service, the rates which were in fact adopted, and which we do not propose to change, he adds:

> And it is proposed these sums shall be in full of all commutation of quarters, fuel, forage, servants' wages, and clothing, longevity rations, and all allowances of every name and nature whatever, and shall be paid monthly by the paymaster. Then it is proposed by the committee to amend this bill so as to provide that quarters and forage may be furnished to officers, and that when not furnished no commutation shall be given.
> Gentlemen say that this pay is too low for those who are here, (in Washington;) that they have to rent houses. If the officers here think that the pay is too low let them go to the field, and let some of the officers who are in the field come here. * * * We propose that there shall be no difference between the pay of Army officers who are in the field and those of the same rank doing easy duty in cities.
> By this bill, as proposed by the Military Committee with the amendments to it which will be offered, there will be saved to the Government in the pay of officers about $1,500,000 and in respect to commutation of quarters, fuel, &c., an amount of money you can hardly conceive of. I do not know the exact amount that will be saved in that way, but it will be a large amount. The total saving by this bill will, I am satisfied, approximate to $3,000,000 per annum.

All this will be found in the Congressional Globe, volume 81. In the report made the previous year by the then chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, certainly a member of the committee, [General GARFIELD,] he says:

> A reform is needed in the system of Army pay, which is cumbersome and complicated and works greatly to the disadvantage of officers serving in the field and on the frontiers. Fixed salaries, such as are paid in the Navy and in all branches of the civil service, should be substituted for the various allowances and commutations which make up the pay of Army officers.

I have no doubt General Logan tried honestly to carry out the declarations he made in his speech and which were in accordance with the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio voted for that bill. I presume he thought it would carry out the doctrine he had advocated. I think the country will be astonished to know that no economy was effected at all. Allowance for forage, the allowance for fuel, the allowance for quarters, have gone on ever since in exactly the same way only under a different name, the word "kind" being substituted for "commutation." And not a dollar was saved by Logan's bill, so far as I can ascertain, except the economy due to the reduction in the number of officers. The officers were paid and have continued to be paid from that time to this at rates which will be found in this table which I shall print and which, I think, will be generally thought to be tolerably liberal, especially as currency and gold are now on a level.

The General of the Army, whose pay proper is $13,500, really gets $17,700. The Lieutenant-General, whose pay proper is $11,000, gets $13,266. A major-general, whose pay proper is $7,500, gets $9,944.75. A brigadier-general, whose pay proper is $5,500, gets $7,504. Colonels, whose pay proper is $3,500 and with longevity allowance $4,500—and I wish to say that all get the longevity allowance and it is quite right that they should—that should be understood—get $6,171. And so throughout the list all the way down the pay varies from 25 to 40 per cent. in addition to the pay proper. And General Logan seems to have thought that these allowances would be cut off entirely by his bill.

How do we deal with it? You noticed that remarkable statement that he intended officers in the field should be as well paid as officers living at headquarters in Washington. It was not done. The allowances to officers here continued to be and are to-day greater than to officers in the field, at least if they actually keep horses. How do we deal with it? We let the pay of officers in the field alone. We furnish them with quarters as they are now furnished. Where they have horses we give them forage. Where they have no horses we cut it off. Is there a man in this House who will say an officer should have forage for horses he has not?

General Logan's bill tried to prevent that abuse. I think he used language which ought to have prevented it. But it has been construed to mean that when an officer had not a horse the forage should be delivered to him in kind, and then he could sell the forage and put the money in his pocket. That has been the usual practice in the Army. I do not think it is right, but it has been construed to be the law, and they do not violate the law by doing it.

I was not disposed to cut off the fuel allowance; but when we began to investigate it we found a state of things which made it necessary to deal with it. There are 2,161 officers. The expense of fuel to those officers last year was $441,000, nearly $200 apiece for every officer in the Army, married and single. Now, there is no sense in that. At first it was proposed to cut it off entirely, but subsequently it was found that there were officers on the frontier who could not get fuel. It could only be got from the Government stock. And then again, if they got it at cost under the law for that purpose they would have to pay an enormous price, sometimes twenty or thirty dollars a cord. The committee therefore adopted a rule to give the officers the right to purchase the fuel from Government stock at $3 a cord, wherever it may be. That is less than it costs the Government; it will be a benefaction to the officer to the amount of 60 per cent. of the cost of the fuel.

The Government will pay more than half the cost of the fuel, but the system will insure economy and effect a saving which is estimated at about $200,000 per annum.

Now, then, a word about quarters. We have cut off nothing, absolutely nothing, from an officer serving in the field or on the frontier, except this fuel allowance. Then the officers in Washington say: "That is unjust to us; you have cut down the allowance for quarters to one-half what it is at the present time," for the bill restores it to the allowance made in 1860. Now, of the propriety of that restoration others can judge as well as I can; but it is really no grievance that that allowance is cut down. The law originally did not contemplate any obligation to furnish quarters to any officer; it gave him a salary, and his salary was supposed to be adequate remuneration for his services. At the posts there were no quarters that could be hired, and the Government furnished necessary quarters, and in course of time made an allowance for quarters to the officers elsewhere who had none. I do not know whether the allowance for quarters is adequate or not, but I do know that under the revised table of pay which I hold in my hand these officers in Washington will be as well paid for their services as any corresponding services are paid for in civil life, and they are better paid than the officers of the Navy.

I hold in my hand the statement of what will be received by the officers under this bill as it stands. It is an instructive statement. The General of the Army under this bill will receive $15,000. The Lieutenant-General will receive $11,648. A major-general will receive $8,148; a brigadier-general, $6,040.

A MEMBER. Does that include the allowances?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That includes salary, allowances, everything. A colonel of cavalry will get in pay and in longevity, including allowance for quarters, $4,840.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman explain how he counts longevity?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am to make a statement about longevity if the gentleman will wait for a moment. Under the bill his pay proper is $3,500; his longevity allowance $800; this would give him $4,300, to which is to be added his quarters, if he has them, or an allowance of $540 in lieu thereof, making $4,840 in all.

Now I wish to say one word about the reporter of a bill. I have reported this bill to the House under instructions from my committee. There are some things in which my judgment has been overruled by my colleagues. I trust I do not violate any proprieties in saying this, and that I am bound by the action of my committee.

At the same time I am free to say that personally I would not have interfered with the longevity allowance of major, lieutenant-colonel, or colonel, who now get $1,000, and are cut down to $800 by this bill. I think that the addition of $1,000 for long service, making the pay $4,500, exclusive of quarters, would not be too much pay for a colonel. He gets, in addition, his quarters; if he is on service he gets his forage if he has horses; he gets his fuel at $3 a cord; and he buys all his supplies, of every kind, at actual cost. If he continued to get the longevity allowance of $1,000 he would receive when here in Washington $5,040 per annum.

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask my colleague whether, if the longevity allowance should be limited to $800, he would not, with the other allowances made, receive $5,000 under this bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir; he would then have $4,840, besides what he may gain in the price of fuel, and I do not think this would be worth more than $50 additional. I do not think it fair to count the forage allowance, because the horses, if he keeps them, are not for the colonel's use, but are needed for the proper discharge of his duties.

Mr. ATKINS. But he needs no horse in the city.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then he will get no allowance for forage. The bill reduces the longevity allowance $200. There is no other change in the pay, and I am not in favor of this change.

Now, there are many things in which an Army officer has advantages over a civilian. In the first place he holds a position in which he is secure for life. For the bill provides that if he does not choose to go he need not go.

Mr. MARSH. I would ask the gentleman if he put in that provision in accordance with the views of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am not in a position to state to the House the views of a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs. I can only state the views of a majority of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MARSH. Has not the gentleman taken that position in defiance of the wishes and views of a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My answer is that when the Military Committee were asked for suggestions they were told that this was one of the principles on which we were going to act, and they never made any suggestion to the contrary. What they would have done if they had had the power I do not know.

Now, I say the Army officers have positions for life. Civilians have not. Moreover, they have retiring pensions; they have the right to purchase supplies at cost, and they get medical attendance free. These are great advantages to be taken into account in estimating salaries. I have been charged by my colleagues with living in an atmosphere of wealth and extravagance and therefore disposed to be too liberal; but I am constrained to say that the provisions in this bill are liberal and ample on the subject of compensation, and I do not think that any just-minded man can object to them. If there is any doubt about it it will be dispelled by comparing the relative compensation of these officers with the officers of the Navy. I had heard a great deal said on this subject, and when I first went into the examination I believed that the officers of the Navy got more than the officers of the Army, but the table which I have had prepared showing the relative compensation of these officers will prove that my impression was erroneous.

Comparison of the pay of the Navy and Army according to the relative rank established by section 1466 Revised Statutes.

Every naval officer while at sea is entitled to the value of one ration, at thirty cents a day, or $109.50 a year. In the column of average pay the pay of the Admiral is fixed by law at the same amount at all times. The average pay of the Vice-Admiral is his shore-duty pay. The average pay of all other officers is computed at the rate of .5 sea pay, .3 other-duty pay, and .2 on leave or waiting-orders pay, this being assumed to be about a fair proportion of the various duties to be discharged.

Officers on shore duty are generally provided with quarters at navy-yards or naval stations.

Mr. McCOOK. I would ask if the grades of Admiral and General do not expire with the present incumbents.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They do; and I am glad of it.

Mr. McCOOK. I asked for information. I knew that the grade of General did, but I did not know that the grade of Admiral did.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If there are any errors in the table I shall be glad to have them pointed out, for I seek for the truth only.

Now I have a word to say about the proposed organization under this bill. I think I need not detain the House to give figures as to the European armies. It is perfectly well understood that the pay of our Army officers is upon a very liberal scale compared with foreign armies. We have 1 officer to every 10 men in actual service, and in England they have 1 to every 19; in France, 1 to every 23, and in Germany, 1 to every 23; so that we have twice the number of officers that any other military organization in the world has, and of course ours is a very incongruous organization.

Now, on military topics I do not profess to express any judgment, but in the course of my consultations with military authorities, in order to get what information I could in regard to this subject, I have received from one of the best military authorities living a statement which will take but a moment to read, and which meets most of the questions raised upon the other side:

The range and precision of modern fire-arms and the application to them of breech-loading, with repeating principle, have changed the fighting unit. Not only has the formation of the column disappeared, but the continuous line has passed away. Battles must be fought by skirmishers, and tacticians must study the best methods of covering the line and feeding it from reserves in the rear. The company instead of the regiment is now the unit of organization for fighting, and the battalion for administration. For a small army, a battalion of five companies—each a hundred strong—should be kept efficient by having a second skeleton battalion in depot to drill recruits. These battalions should be commanded by majors. Colonels and lieutenant-colonels are useless in infantry—mere survivals of a passed military era. The strength of such an organization would be doubled at once by filling up the second battalion, and a third could be added if necessary. Artillery should mean field batteries. There field batteries should form a major's command, and one inspector of artillery with rank of colonel would be useful in administration. Heavy artillerymen, to man sea-coast fortifications, should be attached to the Ordnance Bureau and instructed in ordnance duties as well as in handling heavy guns. The cavalry might be left to its present organization, but it should be borne in mind that the duties of modern cavalry are those of mounted infantry.

Mr. CALKINS. Who is that?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I regret that I cannot give the name of my authority. His statements must go into my remarks for what they are worth. I can only say that the author is one of the military critics in this country, and military men will judge of the propriety of his suggestions.

SAVING EFFECTED.

This bill, as I have said, makes a saving of $3,871,000. It does it in this way: in the pay of officers to the extent of $1,000,000 and in the pay of enlisted men to the extent of $975,000. If you put 3,000 more men in the Army than we propose, it will merely eliminate the one item of $975,000 from the list of savings; that is all it will take out; everything else will remain unchanged.

Memorandum of savings by appropriation bill in amount estimated for present Army establishment, supposing the provisions of that bill to have been executed and the cost of executing them fully paid.

	Regular estimates, 1879.	Estimates for appropriation bill, 1879.	Difference, savings.
Pay department:
Pay, &c., of officers	$5,807,257 50	$4,795,124 00	$1,012,133 50
Pay, &c., of enlisted men	6,068,375 18	5,093,091 18	975,284 00
Miscellaneous items not included in above	577,600 00	559,600 00	18,000 00
Quartermaster's Department:
Regular supplies	4,400,000 00	3,553,208 74	846,791 26
Incidental expenses	1,000,000 00	1,328,000 00
Army transportation	4,400,000 00	4,266,250 00	133,750 00
Barracks and quarters	1,500,000 00	1,124,192 00	375,808 00
Clothing and equipage	1,250,000 00	1,125,305 12	124,694 88
Subsistence department:
Subsistence of the Army	2,600,000 00	2,215,000 00	385,000 00
			3,871,461 64

Included in this table it will be seen that there is an estimate of an increase which this organization will require, and which I am bound in perfect fairness to state. It is in the incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department, $328,000. Being astonished at this estimate, I asked the reason, and ascertained that it was this: they estimated that under this bill the cavalry must be kept up to the full complement of 100 men to the company. There is no such obligation in the bill. It merely says that the maximum of the cavalry shall be 100 men to the company, and the minimum of the infantry shall be 60 to the company.

The distribution is entirely in the control of the General of the Army. Of course the General of the Army will not require the maximum to be maintained in the cavalry, because it has already been given out in the War Department that it is desirable to have more infantry and less cavalry. In that case this estimate of increase will disappear, and in practice I am assured it will never occur.

This economy, for all time, is effected at a present cost of $2,897,000, upon the assumption that all the officers who are relieved by consolidation of regiments avail themselves of the provisions of the act for their retirement. Of course all will not do this, but the salary of such as may choose to remain will be earned in the civil employment to which they may be assigned by the President under the provisions of the bill.

One other point; and I will detain the House but a moment longer. At the proper time a motion will be made by a member of the committee to dispense with this reorganization and to refer the whole question to the board provided for in the bill for reorganizing the staff department. It will be asked: why not wait for the report of the board? That is a proper question.

I should be inclined to wait if we had not already waited eight years, since 1870. General Logan said that his bill was only one step, that a further reorganization ought to be made as soon as possible. Eight years have passed and no further step has been taken.

Two years ago an amendment was put on the Army appropriation bill providing a board to report to Congress a plan for the reorganization of the Army. The board met; it dissolved. The fruit of their labor appears in this book which I hold in my hand, which is a kind of history of the organization of the Army of the United States from 1789 to 1876, and of which, although it is a very valuable document, no member of Congress can get a copy. I have succeeded in getting the loan of a copy myself only through a private source. That is the sole fruit of that commission, except certain letters addressed to the commission, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has reproduced in the two articles he has furnished the North American Review.

Congress has been left in ignorance; whether purposely so or not I do not know. I have been told that the board made no report because there was no time. I tell gentlemen that there never will be time to get a report from an Army board, if you are to wait for a reorganization of the Army until that report comes to this House.

Mr. MARSH. Was that board composed of Army officers? Was it not composed partly of members of this House?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was composed of certain members of the Senate and of this House and of Army officers.

Mr. MARSH. Were not a majority of that board members of Congress?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If so, then I am glad to put those members of Congress on their defense, and let them answer in this House why they did not make a report.

Mr. MARSH. That is what I want you to do.

Mr. McCOOK. The present distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. BANNING,] as I am informed, was a member of that board. He can answer for himself any attack made on the board.

Mr. MARSH. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that it is not fair to throw the responsibility of that board making no report upon Army officers.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will let the responsibility fall where it belongs. If it belongs upon the Army, then they must bear it; if it falls upon members of Congress, they must take it. I only know that the Committee on Appropriations, when they felt compelled to take up the question of reduction of taxation, which it seemed to them ought to be made to the extent of $4,000,000 in the Army, had no information to act upon, and the only information which they have obtained from Army sources is found in a letter written by the General of the Army and addressed to that commission, and which has been reproduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in an article published in the North American Review, where I first saw it, and which Congress was then permitted to see for the first time.

Mr. McCOOK. Will my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] allow me to state the composition of that board?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McCOOK. It was composed of two Senators, two Representatives, and two officers appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, I will say that our duty is to begin; but it is equally our duty to do nothing recklessly. We have begun. All that we have done is in the direction which has been recommended by the best authorities in the Army, that is to have full instead of skeleton regiments. The bill proposes a plan by which a skeleton organization may hereafter be created. It deals with abuses that have been the subject of comment and reproach for a long time. We have not attempted to go beyond the correction of those abuses. We have left and intend to leave the door open for a report from the board to be constituted under this bill, who will be required to report to this House by the 1st of December next a further plan of reorganization, not only of so much of the staff as we have not touched, but of the Army which we have touched. I hold that when we can save nearly $4,000,000 the tax-payers of this country will not justify us in waiting any longer. For this reason and for this reason only I have not been willing to wait as to all the details for the report of that board. Upon that report I predict we shall be able to save $700,000 more, bringing down the cost of maintaining our Army to the basis of 1860, estimated by the head of population.

In conclusion, the following are the points which I have endeavored to illustrate and demonstrate:

1. That it was the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to reduce the cost of maintaining the Army.

2. That this reduction could only be effected by a consolidation of regiments.

3. That the reduction proposed in the bill does not reduce the present fighting force of the Army to the extent of a musket, and admits of an increase, if necessary, to the present theoretical standard at a saving of $3,000,000 on the present cost.

4. That it does not force out of the Army a single officer who chooses to remain in it and who ought to remain in it.

5. That it does not reduce the pay proper of the Army, but only cuts off allowances which are abuses, leaving the Army officers with better pay than the salaries paid in civil life or in the Navy for equally important service.

6. That the savings, if effected, are simply in administration and can be largely increased by further improvements which will be suggested by the board, to whom the whole question of further reorganization of the Army and of the staff is referred by the provisions of the bill.

7. That the tax-payers of the country, who are its producers, will by this bill secure important relief to the extent of nearly $4,000,000, which is equivalent to the addition of that sum to the active capital of the country for the employment of labor now idle.

8. It is therefore legislation called for by every consideration of duty, justice, and wisdom.

Finally, I desire to acknowledge my obligations to the officers of the Pay department and the Quartermaster's Department for the courtesy and zeal which they have shown in giving me all the information necessary for perfecting the bill and explaining its provisions. High as was my appreciation of the fidelity and intelligence of the officers of the Army, I find it increased by personal contact with them, and it would be a source of profound regret if in the performance of my duty even seeming injustice should be done to a body of men so worthy of confidence and of a generous reward for faithful service.

It is customary, I find, for members who introduce measures of reform to state with how much commendation their work has been received by the public and the newspapers. Frankness compels me to say that thus far I have received no evidence of such approval. How much may be elicited after the bill is understood and discussed remains to be seen; but up to this time I have received only letters warning me against any interference with the Army, while among the newspapers I find one class denouncing me for not having made more radical work by cutting the Army down to ten thousand men, and another class finding fault with me for precisely the opposite reason, that I have gone too far, and crippled the usefulness of the Army. The conclusion in my mind is that the bill steers between the two extremes of opinion, and while for that reason it may not have any warm friends, it conforms to the maxim, In medio tutissimus ibis. But one thing I know, that there is a large class in this country who do not write letters nor edit newspapers, the hard-fisted sons of toil, who understand that every reduction in taxation leaves more money in private hands for their employment, and adds to the sum of their wages, and it is therefore to them that I would look for approbation for this effort to introduce economy into the public expenditures.

Notes to Table I.—1. The figures in this table are based on the simple grade pay and allowances and are exclusive of the longevity or service allowances, which were as follows: In 1860 every commissioned officer, general officers excepted, was entitled, under section 15, act of July 5, 1838, to one additional ration per diem "for every five years he may have served in the Army of the United States." In 1877 officers received, in lieu of the additional ration, an allowance of 10 per cent. per annum for each and every term of five years' service, this increase in no case to exceed 40 per cent., and in no case to swell the pay of a colonel or lieutenant-colonel beyond $4,500 and $4,000 per annum respectively; section 24, act of July 15, 1870, (sections 1261–1267, Revised Statutes.) The table for 1860 is exclusive also (excepting in the case of the brevet lieutenant-general) of the additional pay and emoluments, according to brevet rank, which from April 16, 1818, to March 3, 1865, was allowed to officers when on duty and having a command according to their brevet rank. With the exception of the brevet pay, which was not universal, and the longevity allowance, which necessarily varied according to length of service, the column of "total paid by Pay department," 1860, covers every money allowance received by an officer on his pay account. The same is true of the column "Pay," 1877, which represents the salary of each grade substituted by the act of July 15, 1870, for the previous system of "pay and allowances" of every name and nature, excepting quarters, fuel, and forage in kind furnished by the Quartermaster's Department.

2. In 1860 double rations were "allowed to the major-general (brevet lieutenant-general) commanding the Army and to every officer commanding in chief a separate army actually in the field; to the generals commanding the eastern and western military geographical divisions; to the Quartermaster-General and the Adjutant-General; to the colonels or other officers commanding military geographical departments; to the commandant of each permanent or fixed post garrison with troops, including the Military Academy at West Point, and the armories and arsenals commanded by commissioned officers." This allowance was (under the varying provisions and constructions of different enactments comprehending a greater or less number of officers than above indicated) in force from March 3, 1797, to July 1, 1870. When paid to captains and lieutenants (instances not rare) it increased the total pay of either grade at the rate of $439.20 per annum, an average of $36.60 per month.

3. In 1860 aids to major-generals were entitled to $24 per month in addition to pay in the line, and aids to brigadier-generals to $20 per month, less price of one ration. An acting assistant commissary received the same additional pay as aid to brigadier-general. The aids, if taken from infantry regiments, were further entitled to forage for one horse. In 1877 aids to major and brigadier-generals were allowed $200 and $150, respectively, in addition to pay in the line. If taken from infantry regiments they were also entitled to difference of mounted pay. Their pay is made up in this table without reference to forage or mounted pay allowance.

4. Regimental adjutants and quartermasters were taken, in 1860, from the first or second lieutenants of the regiment. In this table they are assumed to be first lieutenants. They were allowed $10 per month in addition to grade pay. Forage was allowed to an adjutant of infantry for one horse, and to a regimental quartermaster of infantry for two horses. Since 1866 these officers have been extra lieutenants.

5. In 1860 military storekeepers, Quartermaster's Department, and ordnance storekeepers at arsenals of construction and in Oregon, California, and New Mexico, received $1,490 per annum; other ordnance storekeepers, $1,040. All were allowed two rooms each, but no fuel. The law gave them no rank in the Army. In 1877 the storekeeper (paymaster) at Springfield armory had by law (act of March 2, 1867) the rank, pay, &c., of major of cavalry, and all other storekeepers the rank, pay, &c., of captain of cavalry.

6. Retired officers prior to July 1, 1870, received the pay proper of the highest grade held by them, and four rations per day; since that date they receive 75 per cent. of pay (salary and increase) of their rank, but no increase accrues for time passed in retirement subsequent to July 1, 1870.

7. The figures under the heading "1860—Paid by Quartermaster's Department," are obtained by taking for "quarters" the average of the several rates of commutation paid at the different points noted in the data furnished by the Quartermaster-General's Office, and for "fuel" and "forage" the average contract or market price at the same points, believed to represent the average cost throughout the United States.

8. In the table for 1877 the figures for "quarters" are based on the general regulation rate of rent, $18 per room, for the regulation number of rooms. The figures for "fuel" and "forage" represent the average cost of same, to the Quartermaster's Department, throughout the United States.

9. Since July 17, 1862, the law has authorized forage to be furnished in kind only. Previous thereto officers could draw it in kind from the Quartermaster's Department, or, if they chose, or the Quartermaster's Department was unable to furnish in kind, could draw money commutation thereof at the rate, fixed in act of April 24, 1816, of $8 per month for each horse allowed. The commutation was charged for on the officer's pay account and paid by the pay department. The table for 1860 is therefore made to show, under head of "Paid by Quartermaster's Department," the money value of forage in each case when drawn in kind, and also, under the head of "Paid by Pay department," the amount payable for commutation of forage where the officer chose to commute. But only one of the two sets of figures is included in the column of "Grand total." The forage allowance for the General and Lieutenant general is fixed by law (May 28, 1798) at $50 per month. Previous to July 1, 1870, it was always paid in money by the Pay department.

* This grade created since 1860. † None allowed. ‡ See note 1, table 2.

Notes to table 2: 1. The columns of "pay," 1860 and 1877, present the simple grade pay only in each case, exclusive of any and all allowances, bounties, or additions of whatever nature, (see note 2.) The columns of "clothing" represent the average of the varying annual allowances for the five years of enlistment as fixed in the clothing table for the time. The columns of "subsistence" represent the contract price for the time of one ration a day for one year, excepting in the cases of sergeant and corporal of ordnance, entitled by law to one and one-half rations per diem. Quarters and fuel are omitted, as, being almost universally furnished in kind at posts built and owned by the United States, no data are obtainable. The figures of the value of these allowances when commuted are given in note 5.

2. In 1860 the following allowances, bounties, and additions, were authorized: (a) Three months' extra pay for re-enlistment, act July 5, 1838, discontinued by act August 3, 1861; (b) bounty for enlistment at distant stations, act June 17, 1850, equal to cost of transporting and subsisting a soldier from the harbor of New York to place of enlistment, which varied from $23 to $142, according to remoteness of point of enlistment, and was payable in unequal installments at the end of each year's service, discontinued by act August 3, 1861; (c) $2 per month to privates receiving a certificate of merit, acts of March 3, 1847, and August 4, 1854; (d) $2 per month for first re-enlistment and $1 additional per month for each subsequent re-enlistment, act August 4, 1854. This was a longevity or service allowance. In 1877 the following additions were authorized: (1.) The longevity allowance noted in (d;) (2.) the allowance for certificate of merit noted in (c;) (3.) $1 additional for each of the third, fourth, and fifth years of a first enlistment, constituting a permanent increment of $3 per month for service in any subsequent enlistment. Twelve and a half cents per month was deducted in 1860 and 1877 from the pay of every enlisted man for benefit of the Soldiers' Home.

3. The figures of "pay," 1860 and 1877, represent the minimum annual pay of each grade for the time. The maximum annual pay attainable in 1860 in any case (that of a soldier who had been at least ten years in service and enjoyed the benefits indicated in (a) and (d) note 2) would be approximately found by adding $55 to the figures of "pay" given in the table for that year; this would represent an average addition of about $5 per month to the simple grade pay. The allowances indicated in (b) and (c) note 2, are not included in this estimate, as (b) was not of universal but local application and varied according to locality, and (c) was confined to one grade and of rare occurrence. Where enjoyed they might swell the addition to $9 per month. The maximum annual pay attainable in any grade in 1877 (the case of a soldier who had then seen at least twenty-five years of continuous service) would be found by adding $108 to the figures of "pay" given for such grade in the table for that year, being an increase of $9 per month over the rate of pay allowed a man commencing service. This is exclusive of (c) for reasons before stated.

4. Extra-duty pay was allowed in 1860 as follows: To enlisted men on constant labor of not less than ten days at stations east of the Rocky Mountains, twenty-five cents per day when employed as laborers and teamsters and forty cents when employed as mechanics, or thirty-five and fifty cents, respectively, when employed at stations west of the Rocky Mountains, act August 4, 1854. Not allowed to ordnance and engineer soldiers or artificers of artillery when employed in their appropriate work, (paragraph 884, Revised Regulations, 1857.) In 1877 the extra-duty allowance was thirty and thirty-five cents at all stations, (General Orders No. 79, Adjutant-General's Office, 1866.)

5. Enlisted men of the general service, or detailed from companies, on duty as clerks and messengers in the War Department, at headquarters of military divisions and departments, &c., were allowed monthly commutation of quarters, fuel, and subsistence, (where there were no public quarters and no mess facilities,) and extra-duty pay, as follows:

			Quarters.	Fuel.	Subsistence.	Extra-duty pay.
1860	.....	Sergeants, (no data for other grades)	$9 00	Regulation allowance at market price...	$22 50	$12 00
1877	Washington, D. C.	All grades, (clerks)	21 00	$9 00	30 00	10 50
1877	Washington, D. C.	Privates, (messengers)	18 00	7 00	30 00	6 00
1877	San Francisco and Prescott, Arizona	All grades, (clerks)	20 00	Regulation allowance at market price...	30 00	10 50

1877	All other points	All grades, (clerks)	10 00	$8 00	30 00	10 50

Subsistence and extra-duty pay are calculated above for a month of thirty days. For extra-duty pay clerks are rated as mechanics and messengers as laborers. (See note 4.)

b As the General would under bill 4867 be fixed in Washington, this column would represent his pay, &c., at all times unless he should take the field in time of war.

c The aids to General and Lieutenant-General have, while serving as such, the rank and pay, respectively, of colonel and lieutenant-colonel, whatever their actual rank in the Army may be. It is thus practicable to make for 1860 and 1877 a definite statement of their pay. The maximum increase receivable by an aid-de-camp to the General would be in case of his selecting a second lieutenant of infantry, the increase being $1,210.50 per annum; and for an aid-de-camp to the Lieutenant-General, in the same case, $2,464.50. The minimum increase for an aid-de-camp to the General would be in case of the selection of a lieutenant-colonel $746 per annum, and for an aid-de-camp to the Lieutenant-General in case of selection of a major, $500. Under bill 4867, aid-de-camps to the General and Lieutenant-General would have pay, &c., dependent upon and variable with their actual grade in the Army, so that no definite statement of the amount can be made. An aid-de-camp to the General might attain to the rank and pay of brigadier-general, (in case of detail of a colonel,) which case would present the maximum increase due to the selection, $1,000 per annum; the minimum increase, in case of selection of a second lieutenant, not mounted, being $300 per annum. Two hundred dollars would also represent the minimum increase for an aid-de-camp to the Lieutenant-General; the maximum increase being $608 per annum. These calculations are on the basis of pay, &c., of officers in hired quarters.

d As this officer is always in public quarters at Springfield, Massachusetts, his pay under bill 4867 would always be the same.

e In addition to pay in the line.

f The longevity increase given in these columns is based on the average length of service for officers of each grade, as follows: colonel (reaches maximum on fifteen years' service) and lieutenant-colonel, 40 per cent. maximum increase; majors and captains, 30 per cent., fifteen years' service; first lieutenants, 20 per cent., ten years' service; second lieutenants, 10 per cent., five years' service.

g From official estimate of General B. W. Brice, Paymaster-General, in General Logan's speech, Congressional Globe, volume 81, page 152.

h No longevity increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, who would next be entitled to the floor, has informed the Chair that he yields his time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCOOK.]

Mr. McCOOK. I did not understand that to be the case. I would like to know whether I am to speak in the time of the gentleman from Ohio or in my own. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I presume I have some right to speak on this question, as the Committee on Appropriations have practically assumed our functions.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the uniform custom, members of the committee reporting a bill are first entitled to be heard upon it.

Mr. McCOOK. My only reason for raising the question was that I did not want to interfere with the gentleman from Ohio at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that my colleague waives for the present his right to speak to allow the gentleman from New York to come in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] speaks in the time of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman from New York, as I understand, is to speak in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. As is customary, there has been handed to the Chair a list of gentlemen who desire to speak after the time allotted to members of the committee has been consumed; therefore the Chair, in recognizing the gentleman from New York, who is not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, must recognize him in the time of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not understand that my colleague waives his right to speak on this subject.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There has been a distinct understanding on this subject, and I will state it: the understanding was that the gentleman from New York was to speak in the time of the gentleman from Ohio, and that the latter gentleman should take his chance of getting from some other member of the committee such time as he might need.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not know that.

Mr. McCOOK. I do not think that my speech is of so much importance to the House or the country that I would be justified in attempting to say anything in the time of the gentleman from Ohio, if that is to exclude him from the right to speak.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was understood by the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] would speak in his time. I will see that the gentleman from Ohio gets as much time as he needs.

Several MEMBERS. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The only change is that the gentleman from Ohio takes his place among those not members of the committee, and yields his place as a member of the committee to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCOOK.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio yields his right?

The CHAIRMAN. He yields his right as a member of the committee and his priority as such.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then will he take the place of the gentleman from New York, on the list of those not members of the committee?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. As I understand, he will take the place of the gentleman from New York on the list, but may get in earlier by some arrangement with some other member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Ohio desires to speak, it will then be time enough to decide any question that may arise. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Chairman, by the rules of this House "it shall be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to take into consideration all subjects relating to the military establishment and public defense, and also to report from time to time such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in said establishment." In accordance with this rule that committee has been engaged for five months in an effort to perfect a bill for the reorganization of the Army, but after all of its labor and investigation the Committee on Appropriations without authority, has assumed to dictate an Army bill to them and the House. The neglect of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs to resent this interference is not concurred in by the minority; for, while they have not failed to conceal their hostility to the bill presented by their chairman, they have always urged the propriety and necessity of maintaining the rights of their own committee. Any bill that may be presented in the future by that committee can be but little more than a mere copy of the one under discussion, and it does not at all break the force of my objection to this procedure to assert that the bill adopted by the Committee on Appropriations is substantially the one which passed the Committee on Military Affairs.

So far as I am personally concerned, I confess that when I was assigned to the Military Committee I considered it a great honor, especially when I knew that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] was to be its chairman. His long legislative experience, his great military knowledge, and his general capacity for affairs, justified me in thinking that the committee over which he presided would retain as heretofore its proper rank in this House, and that he at least would resent promptly and effectively any effort to make it subordinate to or a mere appendage of that of Appropriations. Acting on the theory that we really were a committee of this House, with our duties clearly defined, we commenced an investigation looking toward the reorganization of the Army. Witnesses have been summoned from all sections of the country at great expense and have been examined by us; and Army officers have been overwhelmed with circular letters containing elaborate questions on matters supposed to be of vital importance. Generals, colonels, and captains have been subjected to searching examinations and cross-examinations by those who believed in the necessity for reorganization, and daily sessions, subcommittees, and short-hand reporters have consumed our time and patience.

Through all this scene of bustle and confusion the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] assisted by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] moved serenely and composedly, guiding and directing the deliberations of the committee in so masterly a manner that he won the admiration of even those who opposed him.

It would be tedious to give the details, but the quantity and quality of information gathered in regard to Army topics was simply enormous, until after four distinct efforts the bill was deemed so perfect that we only awaited an opportunity to report it to the House.

At this particular period the indefatigable and enterprising gentleman from New York who has just spoken [Mr. HEWITT] came to the front. Reaching out his long and powerful arm from that "tower of strength," the room of the Committee on Appropriations, he laid his heavy hand upon the work of our committee, and although he may modestly disclaim any knowledge of military affairs, he has developed a genius for appropriating and utilizing the work of others that falls but little short of inspiration. At one bound he has placed himself in the front rank of army organizers, the peer of Frederick, Carnot, McClellan, Bismarck, and Von Moltke, while our more plodding and methodical chairman is left far in the rear in this race for immortality. With unerring sagacity he detected the flaws and discovered the merits of the so-called "Banning bill," approving here and rejecting there with such nice skill and discrimination that his associates must have gazed with awe upon this versatile genius, who is equally at home whether reorganizing an army, remodeling a consular system, or readjusting the difficult questions growing out of the payment of pensions. The result of his work is before the House in bill 4867; and it is because my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] has practically gathered to himself all of the functions of the committee to which I belong that I have presumed to address the House in the time of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, it is in no factious spirit of opposition to that portion of the bill relating to army organization, but because I am convinced that it is wrong in principle and injurious to the best interests of the Army and the country that I object to its becoming a law. The question of the reduction and reorganization of the Army is not a new one. Ever since the muster-out of the great armies that were called into existence to maintain the integrity of the Union, the problem of how many officers and men and how many regiments should compose the regular establishment has been a serious and difficult one. For the last ten years nearly every Congress has considered the subject, sometime in the interests of economy, but too often in a spirit of hostility, until its assembling is looked forward to with something like fear by those whose cause should be ours and whose services entitle them at least to the respect and confidence of the Representatives of the people.

I do not stand here as the advocate of a large regular Army or to express the opinion that the system governing it is a perfect one. That improvement is possible, I concede; that changes or modifications are necessary is more than probable; but I assert that hasty or crude legislation is not desirable, and that it will defeat the very purposes for which it is said the bill has been framed. What the Army wants or, at all events, what it should have is a carefully considered bill, prepared or suggested by those thoroughly conversant with its needs and then discussed outside of all prejudice or partisanship. With some knowledge of the facts I express the belief that this cannot be done by even the Committee on Appropriations in a single session; and while I bear cheerful testimony to the almost omnipotent wisdom of those who have reported it, I adhere to the opinion that the bill before us is radically defective in many important particulars. This view of mine is strengthened by the fact that before reaching us in its present shape substantially the same bill has been four times amended and committed to the Military Committee; and each discussion disclosed serious faults. It was originally reported January 28th and referred. On the 25th of February it was recommitted with amendments. On March 6th it was again amended and recommitted; and finally, on March 25th, after having been submitted to the scrutiny of a party caucus, called, I imagine, not to perfect a plan of Army reorganization but to ascertain to what extent party support could be relied upon, the authors of this reform rested from their labors and the present committee assumed them.

Mr. Chairman, with all that has been said and written in regard to the reorganization of the Army, it would be absurd to say that none of the provisions of the bill are commendable; but whatever of good it contains is drawn almost exclusively from the professional knowledge of those who have made the Army and its wants the study of a life-time.

The credit of originating the objectionable features belongs entirely to members of Congress; and although the indignant protests of the country caused the elimination of the worst features of the bill as originally drawn, the fact remains that the section providing for the disbandment of the Army was seriously contemplated and received the sanction of distinguished members of the Military Committee, and possibly of members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must object to any inference of that sort. It is entirely unfounded in fact.

Mr. McCOOK. I said "possibly."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I still object. I think it would be in better taste for the gentleman to confine himself to the facts.

Mr. McCOOK. On the 28th January the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] introduced a bill which was the groundwork of the present one, but containing the section to which reference has been made. The bill as amended February 25th contained the same section, but that of March 6th did not; and it was wisely concluded not to attempt to incorporate it in the one finally determined upon.

A mere reference to it will be the best commentary I can offer upon the danger of approaching so grave a subject with the determination of enforcing certain views at whatever cost and regardless of consequences.

The section was as follows, and it is but fair to say that it has found no favor in the eyes of the Committee on Appropriations:

SEC. 41. That the troops herein provided for, and all others authorized by existing law, including all officers of every grade and in every department of the Army, shall be retained in the service of the United States so long as Congress shall provide for their support, by specific appropriations therefor, and no longer; and if Congress shall refuse or neglect to make the necessary appropriations for that purpose at or before the expiration of the last preceding fiscal year for which such appropriations have been so made, such refusal or neglect shall be deemed equivalent to an express act for the abolition of the military establishment, and the Army shall forthwith be disbanded.

No precedent for such proposed legislation can be found in this or any other country since the days when armies have been recognized by law; and while I have no desire to question the motives of those who suggested it, its enactment would have accomplished what the whole power of the rebellion failed to do; the complete destruction of the Army of the United States. If that was the purpose, it can only be defended on the ground that the Army as constituted is dangerous to the liberties of the people. Any other reason would be insufficient to justify a measure involving such momentous consequences; for the disbandment of the Army means the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars by the destruction of Government property; the turning adrift of thousands of men, many of whom have grown gray in the service of the Republic; the lopping off of the strong arm upon which the country has so often relied in the hour of peril; the destruction of our whole elaborate system of coast and harbor defense, and the exposure of our infant and helpless frontier settlements to the tender mercies of the marauding savage. Fortunately for the fair fame of the American people, no such proposition has come before Congress with the formal sanction of one of its committees; but the unquestioned fact that it was incorporated in an Army bill, that it was discussed and defended and for over two months obstinately adhered to, should make us hesitate before concluding to blindly follow other suggestions from the same source, even when sanctioned by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, in every sense of the word the most important features of the bill under discussion are the propositions contained in the sections reducing the effective force of the Army to twenty thousand men, and authorizing the consolidation and reduction of regiments, resulting in the muster-out of over six hundred of our best and most experienced officers. In recommending these radical changes the size and necessities of the country, the composition of the Army, and the kind and character of its services appear to have been completely lost sight of. Everything was to be sacrificed to the new-born zeal for retrenchment, and if an apparent showing of economy could be made by reducing the cost of our small regular establishment, all other considerations were to be ignored. In order, however, to come to some correct idea of what our Army is and what is required of it, a brief reference should be made to its organization, numbers, distribution, and to the military division of the United States.

Excluding general officers, professors, and cadets at West Point, the officers and men of the staff departments, and the officers on the retired list; the Army of the United States is by law divided into 25 regiments of infantry, 10 of cavalry, and 5 of artillery. Each infantry regiment has 10 companies, each cavalry regiment 12 companies, and each artillery regiment 12 batteries, with their full complement of regimental and company officers.

Excluding officers and non-commissioned officers, the maximum strength of the infantry regiment is 1,000 privates, that of the cavalry 936, and of the artillery 1,464, so that under the present organization the Army is capable of an expansion to 41,680 privates, or in round numbers to 50,000 men, by the process of recruiting alone, without the cost and confusion resulting from the hasty creation of new regiments.

On the 1st day of March, 1878, the official return shows, of enlisted men attached to regiments, present and absent, 18,880. Of this number, there were "present for duty," including the "extra and daily duty" men, 15,866, with 655 sick and 559 in arrest. The total "absent" at the same date was 1,800; and of that number, 1,491 were on detached service, such as escort, scouting, and duties of a similar character; and it is a fair estimate to say that 1,000 of them would be available at any time for "line of battle." From this it appears that out of the total "attached to regiments," there are 16,484 effectives; a most respectable showing, when we consider the situation of our posts and the distribution of the men. This return gives an average of about 350 men to the infantry regiments, 750 to the cavalry, and 475 to the artillery.

The number of men "not attached" to regiments amounts to 3,028, included in the Engineer battalion, the West Point detachment, and Ordnance Department, the Signal Corps, recruits at depot, men at division and department headquarters, non-commissioned staff, &c., giving a grand total of 21,908 enlisted men as the Army of the United States at that date.

For convenience and for military purposes, the territory of the United States is divided into three great divisions, which are subdivided into numerous departments and districts. The divisions are those of the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Missouri, with headquarters at New York, San Francisco, and Chicago respectively.

The first comprises all the territory east of the Mississippi River with the exception of the State of Illinois, and includes Louisiana and Arkansas; and is commanded by Major-General Hancock.

The second includes California and Oregon, the Territories of Alaska, Washington, Arizona, and a portion of Idaho; and is commanded by Major-General McDowell.

The third comprises all that vast country between the two mentioned, including the States of Texas, Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, and others, and the Territories of Wyoming, Dakota, Utah, New Mexico, Montana, the Indian Territory, and a part of Idaho. It is commanded by Lieutenant-General Sheridan; and at least two-thirds of the effective force of the Army is stationed within its limits, and it contains certainly three-fourths of the most troublesome and hostile Indian tribes.

On the north, we have a frontier of 3,600 miles, extending from Maine to Vancouver's Island; for the present, at least, bordering on a friendly power.

On the south, from the mouth of the Rio Grande to the Pacific Ocean, we have a frontier of 2,100 miles to defend along its whole extent against the incursions of Mexicans and Indians; and the condition of that part of our territory is one of chronic disturbance, liable at any moment to break out into open warefare.

On our Atlantic seaboard, we have a shore-line of over 2,000 miles, with numerous forts and posts for harbor defense, while the line of the Gulf and that of the Pacific, excluding Alaska, amounts to 2,000 miles more, all liable to attack from any strong maritime power.

Within these limits we have nearly 400,000 savages, the majority of them vicious and vindictive, glorying in war and bloodshed, and with a capacity for mischief entirely disproportionate to their numbers. Well armed and mounted, accustomed to hardships and privations, and looking upon the white man as their natural enemy, they have shown themselves formidable antagonists, whenever encountered.

The area of the United States is 3,603,884 square miles. It is more than three times as large as Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway combined.

To occupy and defend this vast region, to garrison the numerous and indispensable posts and forts, (amounting to over two hundred,) to extend protection to the pioneer, to render transit across the continent practical or safe, and, equally important, to be in a condition to respond promptly to the call of the States for assistance when their militia systems (as is too often the case) break down under the pressure of grave emergencies; the United States with its 40,000,000 of people have an Army of 25,000 men, and this Army is now to be reduced to 20,000 men on the score of economy.

Mr. Chairman, a glance at the military map will convey more accurately than mere words, the idea that I have attempted to give of the magnitude of the country and the character of the services required of our Army.

Scattered along the great lakes and the seaboard, following the line of the boundary between Mexico and the United States, and dotted all over the plains and mountain regions of the great West and South, wherever an outlying settlement is to be protected or a hostile tribe of Indians observed or overawed, may be seen the flag that marks the site of a military post.

Within the last fifty years our western frontier has been extended to the Pacific, and the adventurous spirit of our people has carried them across the plains and mountains between the Missouri and the Sacramento, building up by the way flourishing States and Territories in the heart of the continent; but always in advance of this tide of immigration, furnishing it protection and assistance, the little Army of the United States was to be found.

In many instances where temporary or permanent posts have been established in this steady march to the West, great cities have sprung up, and many places familiar to all of us, owe much of their present prosperity to the wise selection made for the site of the post, and the protection given and the population attracted by the presence of the troops.

In this pioneer work, marches have been made and distances and difficulties overcome unsurpassed by the Roman legions when the ancient world was subject to their arms; and in this constant warfare with nature, our Army has won victories as honorable and important as those won from the savage foe.

In 1876 the Seventh Cavalry marched from the Department of the Gulf to that of Dakota, a distance of 2,887 miles. What it did there under Custer and Keogh the world knows.

Two thousand years have not exhausted the world's interest in the story of Thermopylæ; yet one man did come back from the fatal pass to Sparta. In our own time the American soldier has surpassed Leonidas and his men; for, of all those who charged with Custer on that terrible July day, not a single one returned to tell the tale.

During the same year another regiment marched from Missouri to Texas, a distance of 1,148 miles. Another, in order to reach its destination in the Department of the Columbia, marched 1,100 miles; another, in the Department of the Gulf, marched 1,730 miles; a portion of the Twelfth Infantry, in order to reach its post in Arizona, marched 2,500 miles; and last year the Second Infantry, in its change of station from Atlanta to Idaho Territory, was transported over 4,000 miles by land and water.

Mr. Chairman, I have given this very imperfect and general outline of the size of our country and the station and movements of the troops, not because the facts are new or unknown, but merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the House, in connection with this plan for reducing the Army, to the vastness of the regions in which it has to operate, the difficulties to be encountered in the discharge of its multifarious duties, and the magnitude of the interests intrusted to its care. Every officer of experience to whom the question has been put has given an unqualified negative to any further reduction; and General Schofield simply reflects the views of every thoughtful man in the country, whether in the Army or out of it, when he says "a force of 20,000 men is manifestly inadequate to the military necessities of the country." There are no petitions, no popular demand for its reduction; and, although small in numbers, no army on the face of the earth has ever acquitted itself better than ours. Situated as it is, hostile legislation may destroy it or impair its efficiency; but nothing can efface from our history the record of its endurance, its courage, and its devotion to duty.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us also proposes to reduce the infantry regiments from 25 to 15 and the cavalry from 10 to 6, and this is to be accomplished by the apparently plain and easy plan of consolidation.

In the practical eyes of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] a regiment is a regiment, representing nothing but so many officers and men at a cost of so many dollars per annum; and the glorious memories and traditions that cluster around each distinctive organization are mere sentiments, not to be encouraged in "regulars" or tolerated by "reformers."

From March 15th, 1815, when the Army ceased to be provisional in its character, to July 15th, 1870, not a single act of Congress can be shown providing for the consolidation of regimental organizations, and the latter was only justified on the ground of supreme necessity arising from the recognized importance of a radical reduction in the expenses of the Government. On the contrary, the increase although slow was steady, and while the acts of March 3rd, 1847, and March 2nd, 1849, fixed the infantry regiments at 8, the artillery at 4, and the mounted regiments at 3, the act of March 3rd, 1855, increased the infantry to 10 and the cavalry to 5, leaving the artillery untouched. This organization remained until the outbreak of the rebellion, when of course it became necessary to enlarge it. Upon a question of such importance to the Army it was to be expected that there would be great difference of opinion among the officers to whom it was submitted. Responses have been received from many of them, abstracts from which are given below; and in my judgment the weight of authority and numbers is against any change, even should a reduction in the aggregate strength be determined upon.

General Sherman, whose patriotism, professional knowledge, and military genius are recognized at home and abroad, says:

It will be observed that I assume the new peace establishment to consist of 5 regiments of artillery, 10 of cavalry and 20 of infantry, each to have the same identical organization, leaving to the artillery and cavalry the same number of companies as now, and diminishing the number of infantry regiments by 5, but adding 2 companies to each regiment, thus disbanding 10 of the existing companies.

He also favors the division of the regiment into three battalions of 4 companies each; and his table shows a total of 25,760 men upon his proposed plan.

General Hancock, who has passed through every grade to his present well-earned rank, who has served on the staff and in the line, who has commanded companies as well as army corps, and who is as modest and sensible as he is brave, says:

I would therefore offset the increase proposed in the strength of infantry companies by reducing the number of them, having say eight in a regiment instead of ten. The question of any further reduction of these arms (infantry and cavalry) than just suggested should, I think, be deferred a few years longer, until our Indian frontiers are in a more settled condition. If no other disturbances have arisen, I have no doubt that these arms could with safety be still further reduced if then deemed advisable.

His opinion, like that of General Sherman, is given at great length, and should be read with care by those who desire the views of a thoroughly competent man on this subject.

General Schofield says:

A force of even the largest number named (30,000) scattered in small detachments over so vast a territory as ours must be regarded rather as a military police than as an army. Certainly the present organization of our Army is so much more satisfactory than its effective strength that I am unable to think of any change in the former which would be worth consideration. * * * Indeed with twenty-five or thirty thousand men as the aggregate it would be better to break up some of the companies in each regiment. * * * than to consolidate regiments.

General Pope suggests a board of officers to be appointed to whom the questions are to be submitted.

General Howard says:

I would make no material change in the present organization nor would I alter the present strength of each arm of the service.

Adjutant-General Townsend says:

In general I consider the present organization of the Army to be simple and effective, except that more enlisted men are imperatively needed.

Inspector-General Marcy says:

Am convinced that foot troops with suitable components of cavalry for scouting constitute most effective organization for successful Indian warfare, and that if a reduction to 20,000 men be deemed expedient by Congress, I would still recommend the existing regimental and company organizations.

General Ingalls, assistant-quartermaster general, says:

I believe the present organization of the Army the next best that can be made. The nation and the Army are accustomed and familiar with it.

Colonel McKenzie, Fourth Cavalry, says:

Assuming an Army of 30,000 enlisted men, it appears that the regimental organizations could be retained in their present form without disadvantage. With a permanent reduction below that strength there should be a reduction of regimental organizations and of officers corresponding in numbers to the reduction of the men. But there seems to be substantial reasons for increasing the Army rather than reducing.

Colonel Merritt, Fifth Cavalry, says:

Assuming as basis 30,000 men, artillery should be 3,000, cavalry 10,000, and infantry 17,000; and if number of enlisted men is reduced to 15,000, infantry and artillery should be reduced proportionally; while for Army of 15,000 the cavalry should be 7,000.

Colonel Gregg, Eighth Cavalry, says:

He considers reduction below its present strength as so detrimental and so likely to be disastrous in its consequences that he shall not attempt to make any suggestions in reference to proper organization composed of a less number of enlisted men. For an army of twenty-five or thirty thousand men, it will be found, I imagine, impracticable to improve upon existing organization if put in best possible working condition. Infantry organizations are too numerous and ought to be reduced to 20 regiments.

Colonel Wood, Eleventh Infantry, says:

Assuming 30,000 enlisted men as the basis, regiments should be 8 of cavalry, 5 of artillery, and 25 of infantry.

Colonel Wilcox, Twelfth Infantry, says:

For an army of 15,000 men, (just one half of what we need until the northern and southern continental railways are built,) 7 regiments of cavalry, 4 regiments of artillery, and 16 regiments of infantry. For 30,000, 10 regiments of cavalry, 5 of artillery, 25 of infantry, (present organization.)

Colonel De Trobriand, Thirteenth Infantry, says:

I recommend 10 regiments of cavalry, 30 batteries of artillery, and 20 regiments of infantry, with scouts, engineer battalions, &c., making a total force of 28,200 men.

Colonel Smith, Nineteenth Infantry, says:

The proportion of arms of service should be, cavalry two-tenths, artillery one-tenth, infantry seven-tenths; or, under present organization, 8 regiments of cavalry, 4 of artillery, and 28 of infantry.

Colonel Carlin, Seventeenth Infantry, says:

Assuming 30,000 to be the smallest force the United States should keep, there should be 20,000 infantry, 3,750 artillery, and 6,250 cavalry, divided into 30 infantry regiments of 10 companies each, 10 cavalry regiments, and 3 artillery regiments.

He submits, carefully prepared, an able paper well worth attention.

Colonel Dodge, Twenty-third Infantry, says:

On an aggregate of 15,000 men, I suggest 10 regiments of infantry, 3 of cavalry, and 2 of artillery. On 25,000, 17 of infantry, 6 of cavalry, 3 of artillery. On 30,000, 20 of infantry, 7 of cavalry, 4 of artillery.

Colonel Hatch, Ninth Cavalry, says:

I suggest that, on a basis of 30,000 men, assumed to be the lowest number the necessities of the country require, 10 regiments of cavalry, 4 regiments artillery, and 20 regiments infantry.

Colonel Hunt, Fifth Artillery, says:

Assuming minimum strength at 30,000, I recommend 5 regiments artillery, of 12 batteries each, 10 regiments cavalry, and 18 regiments of infantry.

Colonel Floyd Jones, Third Infantry, says:

In my judgment, the Army should consist of not less than 50,000 men.

Colonel Flint, Fourth Infantry, says:

For 15,000 men, 9 regiments infantry, of 12 companies each, 5 regiments of cavalry, 4 regiments artillery.

For 20,000, 13 regiments infantry, of 12 companies each, 8 of cavalry, 4 of artillery, &c.

Colonel Hazen, Sixth Infantry, is not prepared to recommend any change in regimental organization.

Colonel Gibbon, Seventh Infantry, says:

Do not think the organization of the infantry arm should be changed, except in case of hostilities companies should be increased, at discretion of President, to 150 men.

Colonel King, Ninth Infantry, says:

No change recommended in number of regimental organizations; but companies should be 12 each in regiments of the line.

Under ordinary circumstances the opinions of such distinguished officers would make a non-professional hesitate even when acting from a high sense of duty; but the question is solved without any difficulty by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,]speaking for his committee.

Mr. Chairman, the plan by which the consolidation is to be carried into effect and the supernumerary officers resulting from it disposed of, is a curious and somewhat complicated one.

Section 13 provides that the President is authorized in his discretion to honorably discharge officers who may apply therefor on or before the 1st of January next, and every officer so discharged is to receive certain pay and allowances, graduated by his length of service. If he has served fifteen years he is to receive two years' extra pay and allowances; if twenty years, three years' extra pay and allowances; if twenty-five years, four years' extra pay and allowances, and if thirty years, five years' extra pay and allowances. I also construe the section to mean that, if he has served less than fifteen years, or fourteen years and nine months, he is to receive but one year's pay and allowances, and that the whole is to be calculated at the new rates of pay prescribed by this bill. The proviso, however, is to the effect that if he has been disabled in the line of his duty the President may, in his discretion and in lieu of pay and allowances, place him on the retired list, which under the present law would entitle him to 75 per cent. of the pay of his grade. This section is skillfully drawn, and the inducements offered for an enforced retirement under the guise of a voluntary one are unusually attractive.

As a naked proposition, I concede that it has an appearance of fairness and even of generosity, but there are many and serious objections to it. Among them are, first, the time given, January 1, 1879, is too short in which to make the election; second, our best and most experienced officers of the higher grades, but especially those of the rank of field officers, would naturally avail themselves of it; third, such violent and radical changes would of necessity impair the efficiency of what would be left of the Army; fourth, the pressure applied by the following sections would increase the number of officers of all grades who would avail themselves of the gratuity, thus requiring a correspondingly large sum for their immediate payment; and fifth, it violates the spirit of the original contract between the Government and the officer, which is to provide for him so long as he is enabled to discharge his duties.

The next section (14) will stand as a monument to the combined wisdom and justice of the majority of the committee and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who leads them.

In its general scope it revives the board of major-generals, known in Army circles as the "benzine board" of 1870, which is convened to sit in final judgment upon their brother officers. The information upon which they act must come from the several division and department commanders and from the staff departments; and, upon the recommendation of the board, the President is authorized to muster out the officer, and "he shall not be reappointed." It is provided, however, that the muster-out shall not take place without an opportunity to be heard; but the whole section is so arbitrary that, great as may be our confidence in the officers who would compose the board, the power conferred upon it is liable to abuse.

Whatever force the precedent may have, it is certain that the former board has been subjected to much unfavorable criticism; but bad as it was this excels it in this: that no injustice can be corrected, and that an officer mustered out under its provisions is absolutely without redress.

It can have, in my judgment, but one practical effect, which will be to coerce officers, by the fear of being cited before it, into availing themselves of the provisions of the previous section, (13); thus indefinitely increasing the amount to be paid before the 1st of next January.

The next section, Mr. Chairman, authorizes the transfer of the surplus officers from the regiments to be consolidated, and from the staff departments, to the list of "supernumeraries;" and all vacancies now existing or that may occur are to be filled in due proportion from this list, having reference to rank, seniority, and fitness. If, however, any officers remain on this list by the 1st of January they are to be mustered out with but one year's pay, or assigned to such service, military or civil, as the President may direct. It appears to me that but few will care to remain to that date, when they can avail themselves of the benefit of the gratuity offered by previous sections; but if they should, the authority given the President of assignment to civil duties, confers upon him now, and to say the least of it, questionable powers. Like sections 13 and 14, its apparent purpose is to coerce officers into leaving the service to avoid disgraceful and peremptory muster-out; but I confess that its provisions are not at all clear to my mind.

Mr. Chairman, next in importance to the changes to which reference has been made are the provisions affecting the staff of the Army—a branch of the service that has been much misrepresented and one that in my judgment has been unjustly criticised. The authorities are unanimous in the opinion that the efficiency of an army depends largely upon the ability of the staff; and this applies with especial force in a country where large standing armies are unknown and where in great emergencies the bulk of the army must consist of forces hastily levied.

The subject has been commented upon by distinguished officers conversant with the facts; and, while there is some difference of opinion in regard to details, there is entire agreement upon the main question, that it would be suicidal to act without full consideration.

Fortunately, however, this opinion is not confined to officers of the Army, for so long ago as December 11, 1818, and December 12, 1820, John C. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, discussed the whole question with all the force and clearness characteristic of that great man.

The report is too long to give in detail, but one or two extracts are pertinent to this discussion. He says:

> To compare, then, as is sometimes done, our staff with those of European armies assembled in large bodies, is manifestly unfair. Such a staff is not only indispensable to the efficiency of the Army, but is also necessary to a proper economy in its disbursements; and should an attempt be made at retrenchment, by reducing the present number, it would, in its consequences, probably prove wasteful and extravagant.
> In fact, no part of our military organization requires more attention in peace than the general staff. It is in every service invariably the last in attaining perfection; and, if neglected in peace, when there is leisure, it will be impossible, in the midst of the hurry and bustle of war, to bring it to perfection. It is in peace that it should receive a perfect organization, and that the officers should be trained to method and punctuality, so that at the commencement of a war, instead of creating anew, nothing more should be necessary than to give to it the necessary enlargement. In this country particularly the staff cannot be neglected with impunity. Difficult as its operations are in actual service everywhere, it has here to encounter great and peculiar impediments, from the extent of the country, the badness and frequently the want of roads, and the sudden and unexpected calls which are often made on the militia. If it could be shown that the staff, in its present extent, was not necessary in peace, it would, with the view taken, be unwise to lop off any of its branches which would be necessary in actual service. With a defective staff, we must carry on our military operations under great disadvantages, and be exposed, particularly at the commencement of a war, to great losses, embarrassments, and disasters.
> It is only in war that the benefits of a proper organization of the staff can be fully realized. With a complete organization and experienced officers, trained in peace to an exact and punctual discharge of their duty, the saving in war (not to insist on an increased energy and success in our military movements) would be of incalculable advantage to the country. The number of deputies and assistants in each branch ought to be regulated by the exigency of the service, and this must obviously depend much more on the number of posts than on the number of troops; and as no material change can, consistently with the public interest, be made as to the posts under the proposed reduction, little diminution can be made in the number of subordinate officers belonging to the staff.

These recommendations were made immediately following our second war with Great Britain, and when the necessity for economy was certainly as great as it is to-day. The same conditions that made it necessary in the judgment of President Monroe and his Secretary of War to approach the question of the reorganization of the staff with great care, exist now in equal force; and to a House that manifests so much reverence for the doctrines of the fathers, their well-considered opinions are entitled to great weight.

It will be seen, however, by reference to the bill, that the Committee on Appropriations of the Forty-fifth Congress are wiser in their day and generation than the great lights of their party; for they attempt to dispose of the whole or the greater part of the subject in a light and airy manner that indicates the progress made by that party in half a century. It is true that by section 12 they provide for a board to consist of three major-generals to be convened on the 1st of July, to whom is given power to examine and report to the President, on or before the 1st day of December, the "organization, practical working, and efficiency" of the different staff departments; but in the face of that provision they seek to legislate against the Adjutant-General's, Inspector-General's, and Pay departments, as well as the Bureau of Military Justice, reducing and diminishing the number and rank of the officers.

It appears to me that if this board is competent to determine the question at all, nothing is to be gained by placing a limitation upon its action in the four departments named; and surely the emergencies of the country are not so great, as to justify legislation that strikes at certain branches of the staff by first reorganizing them, and then asking the opinion of a board upon the propriety of our work.

I have neither time nor inclination to enter into a detailed defense of the different departments; but all the questions involved are so complicated and purely professional, that in our zeal for economy and reform we are liable to do great and irreparable injury to many excellent men and competent officers, unless we proceed with great care and prudence.

All or nearly all the officers to whom I have referred, have expressed themselves fully upon the questions involved in the consolidation and reduction of the staff departments; and everything I have read in regard to the subject convinces me that, without exception, the whole matter should be referred to a competent board or commission. Section 12 is a step in the right direction, but no satisfactory or equitable reorganization of the Army can ever take place, until the power therein conferred is enlarged so as to embrace every matter in dispute.

Passing from the sections relating to the staff departments, the bill devotes itself to two or three subjects that require brief mention.

Section 16 prohibits promotion to the grade of major-general "until there shall be no officer of that grade," and then but one, thus conferring upon officers of that rank the inestimable privilege of dying out instead of being mustered out, and effectually disposing of all such nonsense as promotion for merit.

Section 17 limits the brigadier-generals to three for the future, and applies the same generous and reformatory provisions to them that their senior officers are subjected to.

As a special mark of favor, and in recognition of their distinguished services, sections 1095 and 1097 of the Revised Statutes (act July 28th, 1866) fixed the aids to the General and Lieutenant-General of the Army at six and three respectively, with the rank of colonel and lieutenant-colonel.

Section 18 of this bill reduces the aids of the General to four and provides that—

> The aids-de-camp to the General and Lieutenant-General shall not attain by virtue of their appointment a rank beyond that next above their rank at date of appointment.

I do not know how this section may appear to the House, but it looks to me like a petty piece of spite against the two officers named; and when we recall the indignant howls from certain quarters at the appointment of a young lieutenant to the staff of the Lieutenant-General of the Army, it is barely possible that it is a revival of the war on "Grantism" in a modified and puerile form.

The present law (section 1244, Revised Statutes) gives the President discretion to retire officers after forty-five years of service or upon attaining the age of sixty-two; but section 25 of this bill makes it compulsory after forty-five years' service or at the age of sixty-two.

It is difficult to understand upon what information the committee acted when they framed this section. The rule would be an exceedingly arbitrary one, would deprive us of many of our best officers, and in the Engineer department, at least, would retire the five senior officers, including General Humphreys, the chief of engineers; men of activity and ability in their profession.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show by these extracts from the opinions of competent authority, that it would be dangerous to reduce the Army below the limit fixed by the act of June 16, 1874, and inexpedient at least to take hasty and ill-considered action upon the other changes recommended in the bill. I do not believe that there is any necessity or popular demand for either; and I have no confidence in the theory that the time has come when we can with safety, "beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks."

Mr. Calhoun had a very clear perception of this when he said:

> However remote our situation from the great powers of the world, and however pacific our policy, we are, notwithstanding, liable to be involved in war; and to resist, with success, its calamities and dangers, a standing army in peace, in the present improved state of the military science, is an indispensable preparation. The opposite opinion cannot be adopted without putting to hazard the independence and safety of the country. I am aware that the militia is considered, and is, many respects justly, as the great national force; but, to render them effective every experienced officer must acknowledge that they require the aid of regular troops.

And what was true then is true to-day.

Favorably located as we are for the realization of the hopes of the founders of the Republic, that our situation is such as to avoid the "entangling alliances" and great wars of the Old World, we have discovered that we, too, are subject to the usual fate of mortals, and are not exempt from the troubles that have fretted the nations from the earliest days to the present time. As a people we have had a national existence of but one hundred years, yet, startling as it may appear, we have had within that period one year of war to six years of peace, and that too without taking into the calculation our incessant Indian wars.

Our revolutionary war lasted seven years, the war of 1812 for three years, the war with Mexico for nearly the same length of time, and the war for the suppression of the rebellion for four years. By comparison, Great Britain, with all her colonies and dependencies, has enjoyed more years of uninterrupted peace; for since the day of Waterloo, with the exception of the two years' war in the Crimea, she has been engaged in no war of magnitude, and with that exception has not had ten thousand men in line of battle for nearly seventy years.

Had we a Temple of Janus, scarcely a year since the establishment of our Independence would have seen its gates closed; for, supplementing our regular wars, we have had the Indian wars immediately following the Revolution, the Creek, Seminole, and Black Hawk wars, and the continual strife with the Indians of the far West.

If it is conceded that any Army in this country is necessary at all, I imagine no one will dispute the proposition that we require a greater one to-day than at any other period of our history, except when we were actually engaged in war with a foreign or domestic foe.

In 1840, when the country was at peace and nothing indicated the possibility of a war with Mexico, our Army consisted of 735 officers and 12,539 enlisted men; almost exactly one-half of our present force.

Since then we have more than doubled our population and wealth, and have acquired by conquest and treaty over one-third of the territory of the United States; and within this new territory there are to-day almost as many soldiers as were borne upon the rolls of the Army in 1840. From that year until 1860 the number of enlisted men remained substantially the same; but the tables show a steady increase of officers, until in 1860, after many years of democratic rule, the number of officers was increased to 1,083, while the enlisted men were reduced to 11,848.

The present strength of the Army is 2,161 officers and 25,000 enlisted men, and, aside from all comparison between the necessities of the country at the two periods it will be found that the proportion of officers to men is almost identical. Whatever difference there is is in favor of 1878; for while under democratic rule the proportion of officers to men was as 1 to 11, under republican rule it is as 1 to 11 and a fraction over one-half.

I do not make this statement as an argument in favor of the retention of the present number of officers, but for the purpose of showing that the charge of the Army being "top-heavy" could have been made in 1860 with the same propriety; and although it is an entirely proper one to make, I feel like apologizing for even suggesting the political aspects of a question that should be removed from all partisan discussion.

And now, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say, in conclusion, that in my judgment it is not at all necessary to protect the Army from itself, as has been said on this floor. From the time when it was called into existence it has always been able to give a good account of itself against its open foes, but it is powerless against congressional fire in the rear.

The necessity for an economical administration of affairs is great; but to a nation there is something more important than the mere question of cost or of dollars and cents.

No country has long survived the decay or loss of its fighting power; and, while I am far from advocating its undue development; its proper encouragement, within reasonable bounds and under legal restraints, is essential to a free people. Judged by any standard, ancient or modern, the Army of the United States has no cause to be ashamed of its glorious record. Men high in power and place in civil life, men upon whom the nation had lavished honors and position, have proven recreant to their trusts; but the Army as an organization, although sorely tempted and tried, never faltered in its duty.

It is the legitimate successor and has inherited the traditions and virtues of that continental army which, through long years of bloodshed and suffering, achieved our Independence, and it has never departed from them. At all times and under all circumstances it has maintained the honor of our flag and shown its reverence for the law.

In the darkest days of the rebellion, when republican institutions were on trial and when the continent trembled under the tread of armed men, no man educated at the expense of the Government and who remained true to his military oath ever questioned the entire subordination of the military to the civil power. Congress convened and legislated as freely as it does to-day, although surrounded by hundreds of thousands of men commanded by regular officers; and the suggestion so often made now that our Army is a standing menace to our liberties is, in my opinion, a childish one. Small in numbers, scattered over millions of square miles, and hampered by the constitutional provision that no appropriation can be made for it for more than two years, even if it were so disposed it would be powerless to inflict permanent injury upon the Republic. Its present ratio of strength to population is about as 1 to 2,000, and with over 5,000,000 men subject to military duty it appears to me the danger is reduced to the minimum.

Mr. Chairman, I entirely agreed with my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] when he spoke some time since for an army of respectable proportions or for none at all.

Officers and men are American citizens, equally interested with us in good government and a peaceful administration of the laws. They are not composed of the material out of which military dictators are made, and we owe it to ourselves and our people to protect them from the only foe which they fear: hostile legislation.

Unless the doctrine of peace and reconciliation is a meaningless farce, there can be no propriety in dignifying the predictions of those who express fear that the Army may be diverted from its legitimate pursuits, and made an instrument in the hands of unscrupulous politicians. The attempt, if made, would end disastrously; for we come of a warlike in contradistinction to a military race; one too that has always been sensitive to improper military interference and that never has failed to resent it promptly and successfully. None of the conditions favorable to military domination exist in this country, and even if they did they could not be enforced unless we had lost our courage and virtue as a people.

In that event, Mr. Chairman, the number and organization of the Army, or even the form of government itself, would not be worth discussing; and the "man on horseback" might be welcomed perhaps as a refuge and relief from the greater evils that would inevitably follow. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I add a digest of the bill by sections.

Digest of a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Section 1 reduces the Army on or before July 1, 1878, from 25,000 to 20,000 enlisted men, not including 500 recruits, that may be kept at recruiting stations, &c., and appropriates money for its support.

Section 2 reduces the number of cavalry regiments from 10 to 6 and infantry regiments from 25 to 15; or reduces the number of regiments (40) now in service to 26. Considered in connection with sections 4, 5, 6, 15, and 28, will discharge from the line of the Army 14 colonels, 14 lieutenant-colonels, 12 majors, 178 captains, and 246 first lieutenants. Should majors from cavalry be assigned to the five new positions of that grade created in the infantry, the loss of majors in the line will be 7, (sections 5 and 15.)

Section 3 authorizes the transfer or discharge of non-commissioned officers, musicians, &c.

Section 4 adds a second lieutenant to each company of cavalry and fixes the maximum strength of the company at 115 men.

Section 5 provides for the organization of infantry regiments composed of 3 battalions of 4 companies each, and that, until otherwise authorized by Congress, only 2 battalions of each regiment shall be maintained; also for 2 majors to be assigned to each regiment, there being now 1 major to each regiment. It reduces the present regimental organization from 10 companies to 8, or makes a reduction of 30 companies in 15 regiments as now organized.

Section 6 adds a second lieutenant to each company of infantry, and fixes the strength of companies of infantry at 73 men.

Section 7 reduces the number of officers in the Adjutant-General's department from 17 to 5, and provides for the detail of 10 company officers to replace the 12 to be discharged. The periods of service of the 12 officers of the Adjutant-General's department to be discharged therefrom range from 17 to 40 years. Seven officers of the department are made supernumerary July 1, 1878, and 5 on July 1, 1879. The present Adjutant-General vacates by casualty.

Section 8 provides for the discharge of 4 officers from the Inspector-General's department, and the detail of officers, not below the rank of major, for duty at division and department headquarters. This department is now undergoing a reduction by casualties, pursuant to act of Congress approved June 23, 1874. The period of service covered by the officers in this department ranges from 17 to 45 years.

Section 9 reduces the Bureau of Military Justice by placing 4 majors on the supernumerary list July 1. The corps of judge-advocates is now undergoing a reduction by casualties, pursuant to act of Congress approved June 23, 1874. The periods of service of these officers range from 13 to 17 years.

Section 10 reduces the number of officers in the Pay department from 55 to 43, and provides that vacancies hereafter in the grade of major be filled by appointment from captains in the line. The services of the officers of this department range from 1 to more than 40 years.

Section 11 provides that when the rank of any officer is reduced under the provisions of this act the reduction will not apply to the present incumbents. (This includes the Adjutant, Paymaster, and Judge-Advocate General.)

Section 12 constitutes a board, composed of the 3 major-generals, to report on or before December 1 next upon the organization, &c., of the Engineer Corps, Ordnance Department, and all other Departments and corps of the service, except cavalry and infantry and Judge-Advocate's department, and prohibits promotions and appointments in said corps and department until otherwise authorized.

Section 13 provides for the pay and allowances that shall be allowed officers discharged under the provisions of this bill, and for the retirement of such as are disabled in the line of duty in lieu of a discharge with pay and allowances.

Section 14 provides for a board, composed of the 3 major-generals, to recommend, after due examination, the muster-out of such officers as may be reported by division and department commanders and chiefs of staff as being unfit for an efficient performance of duty from any cause except on account of disease incurred in the line of duty.

Section 15 authorizes the President to transfer officers from the line and staff corps to the list of supernumeraries, and from the list of supernumeraries to the line and staff, and the muster-out of all officers on the supernumerary list after January 1, proximo.

Section 16 reduces the number of major-generals from 3 to 1 by casualties.

Section 17 reduces the number of brigadier-generals from 6 to 3 by casualties.

Section 18 reduces the number of aids to the General from 6 to 4; major-generals from 3 to 2 each, and brigadier-generals from 2 to 1 each; also prohibits the detail of officers for duty on the staff till after five years' service with regiment or corps.

Section 19 requires examination of all officers below the rank of colonel before being promoted to a higher grade and provides penalties in case of failure to pass examination.

Section 20 requires the publication in the Army Register of the lineal rank of all officers of the line, given separately for the different arms of the service.

Section 21 provides for filling vacancies in grade of second lieutenant from graduates of the Military Academy and meritorious non-commissioned officers.

Section 22 provides for the selection and examination of non-commissioned officers for promotion.

Section 23 prohibits the detail of any officer for duty on a staff corps until after five years' service in the line, &c.

Section 24 establishes headquarters of the Army in time of peace in Washington, and requires all orders concerning military operations, &c., to be issued through the General of the Army, or, in case of his inability, the next in rank.

Section 25 retires commissioned officers at the age of sixty-five, or after forty-five years' service, (including service as an enlisted man.)

Section 26 requires the discharge of laundresses, but allows laundresses who are wives of soldiers to be retained by regimental commanders till expiration of the husband's enlistment.

Section 27 abolishes the grade of company wagoner.

Section 28 repeals the act authorizing regimental adjutants and quartermasters to be extra lieutenants. This makes a reduction of 80 in the number of lieutenants in the line of the Army.

Section 29 requires all military headquarters to be at points where there are Government buildings, except headquarters of the Army.

Sections 30, 31, 32, and 33 prescribe pay and allowances to which officers shall be entitled.

Section 34 repeals all acts inconsistent with the provisions of this bill.

RECAPITULATION.

House bill No. 4867 provides for the discharge or retirement or for placing on the supernumerary list of the following officers:

Grade.	Adjutant-General's department.	Inspector-General's department.	Bureau of Military Justice.	Pay department.	Commissary and Quartermaster's Departments.	Cavalry.	Artillery.	Infantry.	Total loss.

* Should the President transfer majors from the cavalry and staff departments to the five new positions of that grade created in the infantry, the loss of majors would be 30. (See sections 5 and 15.)

† Regimental adjutants and quartermasters included.

‡ Should the President assign an extra second lieutenant to each company of cavalry and infantry, under sections 4 and 6, there would then be no discharges of second lieutenants from the service. The 10 first lieutenants of artillery fill vacancies as they occur in their regiments.

Total loss, 678, which may be reduced to 495 by the assignment of 5 majors and the extra second lieutenants, as above cited.

Mr. KIMMEL obtained the floor.

Mr. HENKLE moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask, by unanimous consent, that an evening session be fixed for next week, say Tuesday evening, for the consideration of the bill in relation to the administration of the internal revenue. It is an important bill.

Mr. WOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois we arrange four or five evening sessions for next week. If we desire to adjourn this Congress at an early period we will have to transact some business. I am in favor of having three or four evening sessions next week for regular business, and not for debate only.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask, then, that Tuesday and Wednesday evenings of next week be fixed for the consideration of the internal-revenue bill.

Mr. WOOD. I suggest that the Army appropriation bill be first finished and out of the way, and that we go on regularly with that bill until it is disposed of.

Mr. TUCKER. The Army appropriation bill ought to be discussed in to-day's session, and this bill in reference to the internal revenue may be discussed in the evening sessions.

Mr. WOOD. I move that there be evening sessions on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of next week for regular business.

The SPEAKER. The business on Friday would be the consideration of private bills.

Mr. WOOD. I will say Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week.

The SPEAKER. It is always within the power of the House to take a recess and have an evening session for regular business.

Mr. BURCHARD. But when there is to be an evening session it is well to have it understood beforehand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, of next week, the House take a recess from half-past four to half-past seven for the transaction of business in its regular order.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman will not press his motion now when there is scarcely a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum present.

Mr. FORT. I wish to inquire whether the session of Friday evening will be for the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER. It will, that being the business for the entire day.

The question being taken on Mr. WOOD's motion, it was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR ON TUESDAY.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have a morning hour on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks to have it understood that there will be a morning hour on Tuesday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ABSENCE OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he will be absent during the early part of next week.

Mr. EDEN. I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Hon. MILTON SAYLER, a Representative from the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks consent at this time to lay before the House various executive communications, which have largely accumulated on the Speaker's desk.

There was no objection.

ROBERT C. WALKER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report in the case of Robert C. Walker, late paymaster in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICO MILITIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Adjutant-General on the bill (H. R. No. 4276) for payment of Perea's battalion of militia, organized in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CAPTAIN J. B. EADS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting communication from Captain J. B. Eads, with reports of Generals Barnard and Wright; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COLD SPRINGS LIGHT-HOUSE, LONG ISLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information as to the amount necessary, in addition to the appropriation heretofore made, for erection and completion of a proper and sufficient light-house at Cold Springs Harbor, Long Island; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for six days.

EVENING SESSIONS NEXT WEEK.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the order of the House providing for evening sessions next week.

The SPEAKER. The House can vacate the order on either of those days by adjournment.

Mr. FINLEY. My reason for entering a motion to reconsider is that the order was agreed to in a very slim house, and I do not believe that with a full attendance the judgment of the House would be in favor of night sessions.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 20, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the city council of Chicago, Illinois, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Robert H. Love and others, citizens of the Chickasaw Nation, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 3729, upon the subject of arrears of interest due that nation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of E. W. Bullard, of Barre, Massachusetts, praying for an extension of his patent for an improvement in hay-tedders, granted to him on the 21st of May, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented resolutions of the workingmen at the navy-yard at Boston, Massachusetts, in favor of the enforcement of the eight-hour law; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Willard Corney and others, citizens of Westborough, Massachusetts, remonstrating against any change or modification in the patent laws which shall permit the extension of seventeen years' patents; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOAR. I hold in my hand also a letter of H. D. Jarves, formerly an officer in the Army, a disabled officer, concerning sundry defects in the pension laws. This letter is addressed to me, but it is in substance a petition, and it is accompanied by a letter from the governor of Massachusetts, calling attention to important defects in the pension laws which are set forth. It is a very admirable and clear statement. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of M. M. Rohrer, Walter H. Smith, M. G. Emery, and a large number of other citizens, representing themselves as property-owners of the northeastern portion of Washington, District of Columbia, in that section of the city known as the Tiber Valley, praying for an appropriation of $20,000 for the special purpose of enabling the commissioners of the District of Columbia to complete the northern approaches to the Capitol, and the grading and sewerage of the Tiber valley between the points of D and L streets, northeast. They represent that they have been compelled to pay year after year large taxes to improve and beautify other parts of the city, while the section named in the petition has received little consideration. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the General Assembly of Maryland has directed the Senators from that State to present to this body the resolutions, a copy of which I now send to the Secretary's desk. These resolutions commend to Congress the project of a ship-canal connecting the waters of Chesapeake Bay with Delaware Bay and solicit the aid of the Government to the Maryland and Delaware Ship-Canal Company, a corporation chartered by the States of Maryland and Delaware. I cannot say that, in the absence of reliable surveys and a distinct understanding as to the route, the width and depth of the proposed canal, I am prepared to vote for an appropriation of any magnitude at this time. Recently, I proposed an amendment to what is commonly known as the "river and harbor bill," passed by the House of Representatives, and now under consideration of the proper Senate committee, which appropriates $5,000 to make surveys on the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware to ascertain the feasibility of constructing such a canal and the probable cost thereof.

For many years I have advocated the necessity and practicability of such a ship-canal, and it has always seemed to me to be of such importance to the whole country lying north, west, and southwest of Maryland as to demand the liberal aid of Congress. During my term as governor of Maryland I urged upon the Legislature the "passage of resolutions calling upon Maryland's representatives in Congress to press upon that body the subject as one of national importance." In fulfillment of my own suggestion I ask Congress now to take the initiative in regard to this great work.

Baltimore has become a grand reservoir of the grain of the West and Northwest; its shipments of the cereals, petroleum, pork, and other exports have grown with a rapidity which has awakened commercial men all over the country to the fact that, with some aid from the General Government, Baltimore can be made the nearest and best outlet for export trade from the West to foreign lands. As far back as 1871 the national commercial convention, holding its session in Baltimore, passed this resolution upon this subject:

Resolved, That Congress be memorialized to direct a survey to be made between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays for the proposed improvements, and if found to be practicable, desirable, and valuable to the great interests of the country that the said ship-canal shall be constructed.

In 1872 the Legislature of Maryland appointed a committee to urge upon the War Department the propriety of making this survey, and the chairman of that committee and the then governor of Delaware, in eloquent terms, urged the subject upon the acting Secretary of War; but no appropriation has ever been passed to authorize the work.

Since these efforts were made, financial distress has so paralyzed all business as to silence the appeals of those who foresee such beneficial commercial results to be attained by this artificial conduit to the Atlantic Ocean. But now, with the dawn of new life in our commercial undertakings, they renew, with confidence, their request for national aid in the development of this necessary and promising work.

Of several routes proposed, the southernmost seems most practicable and valuable. It would begin about fifty-five miles from Baltimore, on the Chesapeake Bay, at the mouth of the Choptank River, and, by lines not necessary at this time to be specified in detail, it would cross the peninsula and strike Delaware Bay about four miles above the breakwater. This route would require not more than forty miles of canal proper. The distance from Baltimore to the Delaware breakwater, descending Chesapeake Bay and passing around Cape Charles and ascending the coast, is about three hundred and twenty-five miles.

By a canal route, such as I have indicated, a vessel bound to Europe or to any point north of Cape Henlopen would save in distance from one hundred and eighty to one hundred and ninety miles.

These are crude estimates, sanctioned, however, by the opinion of eminent civil engineers, but they can only be verified by actual surveys, by which also we can ascertain whether the construction of such a canal will or will not materially advance the interests of commerce.

I could name several precedents for these surveys and the subsequent construction of similar works of national advantage in the interest of commerce; but I readily recall one which was begun when I first came to the Senate ten years ago; I refer to the canal running along the Iowa shore of the Mississippi, from Keokuk to Nashville, to avoid the Des Moines Rapids at low water; and for the maintenance of which, as a free canal, we have at this session, appropriated $40,000.

I shall therefore urge the amendment to which I have referred upon the Senate at the proper time, believing the work to be one of such national importance as to be free from all constitutional objection, even from the strictest constructionist, and should the surveys be authorized and the result of them present a claim in the interest of commerce, whereby great general good can be secured by a reasonable outlay of the public money, there can be no reason why, among the necessary works of internal improvement, this enterprise should not be undertaken by the General Government and a canal established, free for the vessels of the world, or for the use of which tolls shall be charged only sufficient to pay the expenses of its maintenance and repair.

Instead of delaying the Senate by the reading of the long resolutions, I have submitted these remarks, and move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE presented a memorial of the Merchants' Exchange of Baltimore, Maryland, remonstrating against granting a subsidy to the proposed Roach line of steamers between the United States and Brazil, or to any similar line of steamers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented a memorial of H. F. J. Hoock and others, citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Joseph Schiller & Co. and others, manufacturers of silk hats, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying for the abolition of the duty levied on hatters' black silk plush, or its reduction to not more than 10 per cent. ad valorem; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Commander Henry Erben, of the United States Navy, praying that he may be allowed to appear before the proper board of naval officers for examination for promotion; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of F. W. Church and others, citizens of McGregor, Iowa; the petition of William Sullivan & Son, of Guttenburgh, Iowa; the petition of Theodore L. Morgan and others, citizens of Lansing, Iowa; and the petition of R. H. Adams and others, citizens of Fulton, Illinois, praying for the removal of the local board of inspectors of steam-vessels from Galena, Illinois, to Dubuque, Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of George E. Matthews and others, citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for the abolition of the duty on hatters' black silk plush, or its reduction to not more than 10 per cent. ad valorem; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 376) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee to whom was referred the bill (S. ment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3111) granting a pension to Julia Watkins, widow of Thomas H. Watkins, late captain Company B, Purnell Legion, Maryland, reported it adversely.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, reported it with an amendment.

THOMAS A. WESTON.

Mr. BOOTH. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston, to report the same favorably and without amendment. As this bill has passed the Senate in almost the precise words that it passed the House, only one clause having been added in the House out of abundant caution, I ask the Senate to consider it.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. BOOTH. This is the same bill that passed the Senate some weeks since; only the House passed their own bill identical in terms except that a few words were added to make it a little more stringent, and to protect possible manufacturers and purchasers.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Having been instructed by the Legislature of my State to vote against all extensions of patents, I desire to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BOOTH This is the same bill, as I said before, that passed the Senate. It is not really an extension of a patent. In 1859 Thomas A. Weston filed a caveat for an invention of differential pulleys which entitled him to notice of an application for a patent for a similar invention for two years. Before the two years expired, a Mr. John J. Doyle applied for a patent for the same invention, and without notice to Weston a patent was issued to Doyle. When Weston applied, he was refused because a patent had already been issued to Doyle. Proceedings in interference were had which lasted six years. At the end of six years they were determined in Weston's favor, the Department stating that injustice had inadvertently been done to Weston by their own mistake. In the mean time he had taken out a patent in England, and by our own statute his American patent would expire at the same time with his English patent. He was thus cut off from the use of his patent for six years, and the object of this bill is to give it to him for the full term of seventeen years as he would have been entitled if the Department had not made the mistake.

Mr. INGALLS. This extends to him six years additional?

Mr. BOOTH. He was granted a patent for seventeen years, but he was cut off from the use of it for six years by the expiration of the English patent. This gives it to him for those six years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOMEN AS LEGAL PRACTITIONERS.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1077) to relieve certain legal disabilities of women, being a bill to provide for admission to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States of any woman who is a member of the highest court of the State or Territory, or the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and an amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] that no person shall be excluded from practicing as an attorney and counselor at law before any court of the United States on account of sex, have instructed me to report as the committee reported before, that in its opinion there is no law prohibiting a court from admitting a woman to practice law; and that, therefore, there is no necessity for this bill; and for that, as well as other reasons which I need not enumerate, the committee recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if the committee is not aware that the Chief-Justice in deciding against the admission of a lady applicant for admission, said that the Supreme Court would wait for legislation and alleged the absence of precedents and legislation for such action of the court? I ask if the committee are aware of that fact?

Mr. THURMAN. I really am not aware of any remark make by the Chief-Justice. All we can do is to report what we find the law to be in our judgment, and that we have done.

Mr. SARGENT. The remarks make by the Chief-Justice were not obiter at all; they were the decision of the case. He decided that the Supreme Court would not admit for this reason. I ask that the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. THURMAN. I am requested to state that this is a majority report.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if in determining what the law is the Judiciary Committee declined to consider how it is at present practically administered by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot hear what the Senator says.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that in making up their mind as to what the law is on this subject, the committee of which he is the organ did not ascertain how the law is at present practically administered by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say anything about how it is practically administered. It has been practically administered in several particulars very much against my judgment of what the law is; but I cannot help that. The Judiciary Committee is appointed to find out what the law is, and not to undertake to correct all the malpractice that may happen or the errors of courts in the interpretation of the law. I do not understand, however, that the Supreme Court or any other court of the United States has at any time decided that under the Federal statutes in regard to the admission of attorneys it was a conclusive objection to an applicant that the applicant was a woman.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in pronouncing in its behalf its judgment on an application by a woman to be admitted to practice in that court, declared that legislation was needed to make it the duty of the court to grant such an application in the case of any woman. If that be true, that is the law for this country, if it is so declared and acted upon by that court; and it seems to me very strange that the Judiciary Committee should simply meet this bill by a report that they think the law otherwise and have not inquired how the Supreme Court expound it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee do not understand the Supreme Court to have decided the law as intimated by the Senator from Massachusetts. If the Senator from Massachusetts means that the Supreme Court have said that a statute of the United States was necessary to compel them to admit a female to practice before them, then, undoubtedly they have decided what the law is, because the law does not compel them; neither does it prohibit them. It is said that the Chief-Justice, in expressing the opinion of the court on the application of a particular lady to be admitted on the ground that she was a member of the bar of the District of Columbia or of some State, brought into the oral statement that the Chief-Justice, in connection with the circumstance that the true interests of the times and of women, &c., were not yet advanced to that stage, stated the fact that if Congress wanted to have women admitted hit or miss they could pass legislation to say so.

We find the law to be, perfectly plain and undisputed either by judges or anybody else, simply this, that the several courts of the United States are authorized by statute to admit such persons, and on such terms, to practice before them as they see fit. There is no law that makes sex or race, or anything else a distinguishing element at all. It is left entirely and has been from the foundation of the Government to this day in the discretion of the several courts of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not discuss the matter now; but I will ask that the bill go on the Calendar, and at some early day I shall endeavor to get the attention of the Senate to it and discuss it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not intend to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1276) to reorganize the Court of Claims and extend its jurisdiction to take all claims from before Congress and the Departments for adjudication; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to say that I introduce this bill especially by request and without committing myself for or against it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1277) to extend the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the southern district of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1278) to amend section 23 of an act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1279) to provide for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the eighth judicial circuit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1280) to provide for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River from the military reservation of Fort Snelling, in the State of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1281) to regulate immigration; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1282) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, for university purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit an amendment that I intend to propose to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

I desire to state the object of the amendment. The law creating the office of chief of the division of mail depredations fixes his salary at $2,500. The appropriation bill as passed by the House allows only $2,000. The object of this amendment is simply to conform his salary to existing law. I call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to that fact, and move the reference of the amendment to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the bill will soon be acted on by that committee, and I trust the committee will consider this amendment before they report the bill to the Senate.

Mr. BOOTH, on behalf of the Committee on Patents, submitted an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move that the bill (S. No. 1132) for the relief of Lieutenant-Commander James H. Sands, United States Navy, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

TAXATION OF STREET RAILROADS.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

First. The amount of taxes assessed against the several street railroads in the District of Columbia for each fiscal year under the provision of their charters declaring that their roads shall be deemed real estate and liable to tax as other real estate, and what portion of said taxes has been collected.

Second. If there has in any year been any omission to assess such tax or enforce the collection of the same, the reasons therefor.

Third. The amount of special-improvement taxes assessed against each of said roads, the streets or avenues upon which such assessments were made, the amount collected thereon and the streets, avenues, or roads occupied by said roads for the improvement of which no assessment has been made against them.

Fourth. Whether, in case of the changes in the grade of the streets and avenues occupied by any of the said roads, the said railroads are required to change their said roads so as to conform to such altered grade and pavements, or was the cost of such change paid by the District; and, if so, upon what streets.

Fifth. The appraised value of the real estate, other than their roads or tracks, owned and occupied by each of said roads.

Sixth. The amount of licenses or other taxes assessed or collected of each of said roads for each fiscal year since July 1, 1871, and the amount, if any, now due and unpaid.

ADDITIONAL SENATE LIBRARY.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to consider and report on the propriety of placing in a portion of one of the rooms opening from the Senate Chamber a small library of books of reference for the use of the Senate.

LIMITATION OF COURT-MARTIAL TRIALS.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the bill (S. No. 1114) to amend the one-hundred and third article of war be taken up for consideration. It is an important bill but will require only a few minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "tried," to strike out the words "liable to be," and in lines 7 and 8, after the word "offense," to strike out "charged to have been;" so as to make the one hundred and third article of war, as proposed to be amended, read:

ART. 103. No person shall be tried or punished by a court-martial for any offense committed more than two years or, in a case of desertion, three years before the arraignment of such person for such offense, unless he may meanwhile have absented himself from the United States; in which case the time of his absence shall be excluded in computing the period of the limitation.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state that the bill has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and is deemed wise. It was submitted to the proper authorities of the War Department, and meets the entire approbation of the Judge-Advocate-General, who has charge of the subject. I trust that the bill, as proposed to be amended, will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list. I hope the Senate will take up the bill and consider it. I do not desire to consume a solitary moment's time of the Senate, and only ask that it be taken up and read and passed upon.

The Chief Clerk read the bill by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no time to consider that in the morning hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is just as much time this morning as there will be any other morning.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the question be put to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves the present consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. BLAINE. Why does the Senator wish to take up the bill in the morning hour?

Mr. SARGENT. It cannot be passed in the next ten minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Missouri had better try to take it up after the morning hour.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to take up the bill some time when it can be considered. It certainly cannot be passed during the next ten minutes. More time than that I shall desire to occupy myself.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is due that this bill should be acted upon. If Senators desire to be heard I do not wish to cut them off. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to submit the bill to the Senate on its own merits, just as it is, without any discussion. But if there is to be opposition to the bill I trust we shall take it up, so that Senators who desire to speak against it can be heard. An extension of ten or fifteen minutes of the morning hour could be given and the bill completed this morning with the consumption of as little time as on any other occasion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would say that at the expiration of the morning hour, according to the understanding when we last adjourned, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has the floor on the regular order of business; but with his consent I have no doubt the bill for the repeal of the resumption act could be laid aside informally for a short time for the consideration of this question.

Mr. INGALLS. I gave notice on Thursday or Friday of last week that to-day if possible—and, if not, at the earliest possible moment—I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia. I shall feel called upon to object to any extension of the morning hour for the consideration of this or any other bill; and I give notice that when the Senator from Vermont has concluded his remarks, if no other Senator is ready to proceed on the bill for the repeal of the resumption act, I shall ask the sense of the Senate upon proceeding to the consideration of the bill that I have named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks the present consideration of the bill which has been reported by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senate will take up and dispose of the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri. It is one of those questions which have to be met, and it might as well be met now as at any other time. The postponement of it would be an ungracious and ungraceful thing to do. If the Senate is not going to concur with the House in regard to placing General Shields upon the retired list as an Army officer let us say so. If we are going to do it the only way to do it handsomely is to do it at once and without delay. I presume every Senator in this body has his mind made up as to how he is going to vote upon the question. As a matter of course I do not make these remarks desiring to avoid discussion, if anybody wishes to discuss such a subject, but I hope, inasmuch as the bill has now been called up, that it will not be successfully antagonized by any other business before it is disposed of. It cannot in the nature of things take much of the time of the Senate, and I say to the Senator from Kansas and to other Senators that I shall not yield the regular order of business to any other subject than the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri. If the regular order of business cannot hold its place it will have to be disposed of by a vote of the Senate, for I shall insist upon it with the exception of yielding to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL. I supposed that it was the understanding, even with the Senator from Indiana, that I was to have the floor at one o'clock to-day.

Mr. VOORHEES. I said so a while ago. I said when the Senator was out of the Chamber a moment ago that at the expiration of the morning hour the Senator from Vermont was entitled to the floor by the understanding we had when we last adjourned. But with the understanding that the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri would take but little time, I said I had little doubt that the Senator from Vermont would yield for a few minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I should do so with pleasure if it was probable that the topic the Senator from Missouri proposes to bring up would be disposed of before one o'clock; but the Senator will see that that is utterly impossible. As I do not intend to detain the Senate a long time I do not wish to have any part of it after one o'clock consumed in the discussion of this measure. I am ready to go on at once.

Mr. ALLISON. Then let the Senator from Vermont go on now.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall certainly claim the floor at one o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will consent to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then let the Senator from Vermont go on with his speech now, with the understanding that the Senator from Missouri may call up his bill upon the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course I make no such understanding.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for no understanding. I only give notice to the Senate that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont I will yield that the Senator from Missouri may call up the bill which he has reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will, by common consent, call up the unfinished business of Friday.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. ALLISON, WINDOM, and EATON were appointed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, he measure under consideration is the substitute, proposed by the Committee on Finance, for the bill of the House which provided for the repeal of the resumption act. With out some modifications, and I say it with much regret, I cannot vote for this substiture, though still less inclined to favor the House bill, which to me appears so palpably wrong and uncalled for that no part of its objectionable scope deserves to be preserved, and certainly its scope should not be enlarged. We are both near the time and near the point of actual resumption, and actual resumption swallows up most of the serious as well as the petty differences that have heretofore been only too manifest in public opinion. There is no longer any real urgency to have resumption occur at either an earlier or later day than that contemplated four years ago. The 1st of January now seems rational and opportune. The coinage of silver is progressing as rapidly as its most ardent friends could desire, and whatever the future may have in store, it has not yet depreciated the greenbacks, and cannot depreciate them until the amount of silver issued shall be in excess of what can be maintained at the par of gold. After that, even if we lose our gold, no deluge of silver can make it of less value than its weight in silver bullion. To that goal I fear we tend. All should agree, however, to make it a blessing so long as we can, and not turn it into a stumbling-block. It is now in its infancy, and will no more than get out of the cradle by the 1st of January next. Prior to that time it should hardly be held responsible for much evil, and ought to be permitted to win credit for all possible good.

Contraction of paper money hitherto has been almost wholly imaginary and will surely have lost its terrors when contraction, real or fanciful, wholly disappears in expansion, especially when it shall be seen that all dykes are broken down, and both gold and silver, long pent up, find an unrestricted outlet to fertilize every part of our country. When the resumption act passed in 1875 it might have been pardonable to doubt its propriety, for $1 then in gold brought $1.12½ in currency; but now $1 in gold brings less than a half per cent. premium. Resumption is made easy and its wisdom is fully vindicated. The national banks are ready to co-operate. Business men hail it with acclamation and will joyfully contribute to its success. When it costs little or nothing to exchange paper for coin, and when no importer complains of the hardship of obtaining it, no one else should complain that coin is a necessity at the custom-house. With banking free, bringing forth one hundred cents for every eighty cents of legal-tenders surrendered, giving out fifty millions in exchange for forty, the wants of trade are in no danger of suffering from a lack of currency. It is also proposed to take greenbacks for 4 per cent. bonds. If we can thus refund our national debt at a lower rate, who will be angry, and why should it not be done? By this process we are likely to save more interest than will be paid out on the fifty million gold loan.

These are some of the substantial points upon which, as it appears to me, all might now come together in perfect accord. There is little left to wrangle about or that can fret even a sore imagination, and that little we should try to diminish. Our exports so far exceed our imports that exchanges are certainly not against us, and both the gold and silver bullion from the Pacific seem determined not to leave our shores. The old nest of financial disputes has had its eggs washed away by passing events, and it was only the silly setting goose that when the flood came vainly paddled over and above the submerged site of the empty nest after the eggs had all been swept away. Let us hail resumption, now imminent, as an event, however brought about, that may quicken the pulse of the nation and start us once more on the highways of national prosperity.

But the objections to the substitute are that it brings forth several regretable points which may prove detrimental, or turn out to be possible hinderances, to practical resumption, and which are certainly incompatible with a strict observance of the public faith solemnly pledged in our own statutes now in force, and from their very nature irrepealable. What we are about to enact may stand as a permanent law, not merely on the 1st day of October next, or even on the 1st of January, but for all coming time until modified or repealed. To say, as the substitute does say, that greenbacks "shall be received for duties on imports," giving no option, would compel the Government to receive them under whatever change of circumstances, however great the inconvenience, and might deprive us of the coin absolutely required to meet lawful engagements. Moreover, the provision is based upon the idea of a blindfold jump to resumption, or upon the free delivery of coin for all notes presented, and then to get the coin afterwards. It is a reversal of all sound husbandry. To me it appears rashly imprudent to leap into any position where, by any possibility, we might be forced to receive nothing but paper and pay out nothing but coin. It affords an exhausted Treasury no chance to recuperate. If the time was postponed for such an experiment to the 1st of January, 1879, it would not look so bad on its face, for then it is expected that we shall pay coin for greenbacks, and to that extent treat them as of equal value; but even then the permanent safety of the Government would require that only permission should be granted that legal tenders may be received for duties on imports. It should not be compulsory. This was never contemplated as even a possible function of the legal-tender notes; and on the back of every such note may be read the printed exception that it is not to be a legal-tender for "duties on imports and interest on the public debt." Every note issued bears this protest against any such use, and it will be ever squarely in the face of every holder.

There is, however, another and more insuperable objection to this proposal: that it is not only a clear and open violation of the law, (section 3473,) which provides that "all duties on imports shall be paid in gold and silver coin only;" but conspicuously so of section 3693 and of 3694, of the Revised Statutes, where we may read as follows:

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.
> The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund and shall be applied as follows:
> First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

These acts, perhaps the most memorable in our statutes, were passed by the Senate and House of Representatives and approved by the President of the United States; and shall the Senate, uninvited by any overwhelming emergency, be the first and foremost to disregard and renounce such a pledge? This solemnly recorded pledge was made to give a higher credit to the national loans we were then contracting. Can we withdraw it at our own will and pleasure without beclouding our national reputation? Of course I feel that it cannot be intended, by those who favor this provision, to wrong any party who has trusted our fidelity to laws of our own making—the coin will somehow be obtained for all creditors—but in no cheaper or more legitimate mode; and by its adoption we shall have inflicted an irreparable wrong upon ourselves. A voluntary pledge, made by a government now representing forty-five million people, will not have been observed, nor will any advantage accrue from its non-observance. A pledge of this high character is plainly obligatory upon every American citizen—obligatory, whether native-born or with an allegiance but one day old; and, if once broken, it cannot be again restored. To abrogate it now would cripple our indispensable present resources, adding nothing to those of the debtor classes of the community; and the ugly fact of abrogation would find a place in our history in no way contributing to the future public credit. It was the word—the plighted faith—of the nation, proclaimed with all the emblems of its high authority. No act of mine shall stamp that word as false.

It would appear as though all parties might at least agree upon one point, namely: not to make any new strain upon the Treasury Department by forcing it to resume specie payments at any day earlier than that fixed by law or in advance of January 1, 1879. From all the discussions we have had here, I do not remember that any one has yet advocated the total exclusion of gold and silver from our circulation; but all profess to desire the reappearance of both, and, when they come, that they shall come to stay. Certain it is that we have given a home to silver. Here at least it is not to be treated as a tramp. It is apparent that the Treasury Department may be aided or may be hindered in its march toward resumption by the action of Congress. We may remove obstacles or place obstacles in the way. If the Department were simply to be let alone it must be conceded that there will have been added to its stock of coin not less than fifty millions of gold under the recent contract, and a further sum will be made useful from the coinage of silver, likely from all the mints, to reach twenty-five or thirty millions; that much more, with a steady monthly augmentation, will be either in circulation or will through the custom-house reach the vaults of the Treasury. Wherever it may be it will uphold resumption. Until this additional strength can be realized it would hardly seem wise or prudent to clip the wings of the Secretary and then call upon him to fly, or to say to him, "You are strong enough already," and you shall begin to-morrow or at some very early day to anticipate resumption, either by paying out coin unnecessarily or by receiving paper in lieu of coin prior to the time we have fixed by law for their equality of value. When we shall have once resumed we want no step backward. The time is rapidly approaching, the tide is in our favor, and for assured success we have only to wait. By waiting we shall take a bond of fate in doubling the resources of the Treasury for resumption purposes, and there will be no possibility of failure. But we need to convince the world, every doubting Thomas, of that fact. A considerable sum in coin for interest must be paid on the 1st of July and on the 1st of January. Of course this will diminish the supplies of the Treasury, unless the ordinary receipts of coin for duties shall be allowed to be collected; and to deny or abridge such receipts can serve no other purpose than to plant a sharp thorn in the way of resumption. It is our own feet that will bleed. The mere fractional premium now remaining on gold is likely to soon disappear unless that result shall be thwarted by a rash attempt to do by legislation what will so much more surely be accomplished naturally through the laws of trade. May I not hope that those who have argued that the Treasury is too weak to resume will not strive further to cripple its means?

It is sometimes asserted that a great contraction of money in circulation has been the cause of the recent depression of American trade; and the multifarious securities of the United States, outstanding in 1865, and which have since been funded at a lower rate and longer dates, have been included in the aggregate to prove the assertion; but the old $830,000,000 of 7.30 notes, and the $217,000,000 of compound interest notes were never in any proper sense money, but were very profitable investments, to which the holders clung as long as they were permitted to do so. It is therefore preposterous to lug those securities into any computation of the paper money once outstanding. In truth a general business depression has prevailed and still does prevail over the larger portion of the globe. The era of wild speculation and collapse has passed over us as over others; the bubbles of watered stocks have exploded everywhere; the wastes of war, as the magnitude of past taxes and present debt pointedly shows, have not yet been restored; and nowhere has property of any sort escaped a severe and inexorable depreciation. The prodigal expenditures in many cities, and consequent taxation, has made the holding of real-estate a burden, and in such places its value has greatly diminished. The statesman that finds only a local cause for the recent universal depression of the world's business should look abroad and inquire, what is the matter with our neighbors, and what is the matter with the principal countries of Europe? He will find that we have had no monopoly of grief. If there is comparatively a less amount of money in circulation now than formerly, it is not the primal cause but the logical consequence of less business. A less amount has done the work, and more could not be kept afloat.

Again it is said that in 1875 there was $46,000,000 of fractional currency in circulation, while only $16,950,115.62 is now outstanding; but it should be borne in mind that fractional silver has been issued in exchange for this fractional currency retired, and besides, the exchange did not occur until some years after the initial point of the crisis of 1873. Even the resumption act of 1875 has been cited as the cause of all business woes since 1873. It is the old charge of the wolf for crimes against the lamb before it was born. How unjust and untrue it is to impute to the resumption act the disasters which have overtaken the business affairs of the United States, will be evident when it is pointed out that disasters apparently of greater severity have fallen upon Great Britain, where no resumption act was enacted in 1875, and where the theory of "free trade" is doing its most perfect work. That this may not rest upon my word alone, I will give a brief extract from the London Economist of April 20:

> In the notices concerning "labor" which during the past few months have been furnished in the commercial section of this paper, a record has been given of a vast number of reductions effected in the wages of the working classes throughout the country, the most important of all being those in the iron and coal trades, in the cotton districts, and in the building trade. Strikes have been frequent, and one of the largest of recent years has this week commenced in Lancashire; but such is the condition of trade and so many are the unemployed or partly employed hands that, as a rule, miners, operatives, and masons have been compelled from necessity to surrender upon the masters' terms, for the reason that the masters could not give way without continuing to incur direct losses. * * * *
> But such is the state of trade in this country that it appears to be a question of accepting work at a reduction or of doing no work at all; and if, as we have recently noticed in the steel trade, such reductions have enabled employers to compete for business in quarters from which they were previously excluded, thereby providing more work for their men to do, may not a similar result follow a reduction in the Lancashire cotton trade? * * * *
> The strike which has this week commenced in Lancashire is to resist a 10 per cent. reduction, and in many trades, altogether apart from the shorter hours of work, strikes and similar drawbacks, the position of the laborer as well as of the capitalist has changed decidedly for the worse since 1873.

This shows what the British laborer has to submit to, "or of doing no work at all;" and it further shows that there "the position of the laborer, as well as of the capitalist, has changed decidedly for the worse since 1873."

The most conclusive proof of the general prostration of the industries of Great Britain is made manifest by the important reduction which has taken place in her exports, and a comparison of the amount in 1876 with that of 1872 exhibits a diminution (reckoning $5 to the pound) of $289,060,000. Her imports in 1876 were $590,890,000 in excess of the exports, and that mainly for food. These facts need no comment. France, comparing the same years, shows $41,805,000 less of exports. The foreign trade of the world appears to be declining. All nations are manufacturing more for themselves and less for others. Labor-saving machinery has gone forth to the uttermost parts of the earth. The trade of Belgium and of Italy is stagnant. In Switzerland the depression is marked, and the absence of visitors at the hotels causes numerous bankruptcies. In Austria and Hungary even the coal market is much depressed, "because there is no business being done in manufacturing branches requiring consumption of coal."

I could furnish many more facts equally pregnant, but these are enough except for those who would fain believe that no eclipse of the sun occurs anywhere but in the United States.

Among speculative theorists the cause of the past torpor in the industries of the world shifts according to the exigencies of the argument. Now it is a bankrupt law which must be repealed, or it is the lack of a war income tax which must be enacted. Again it is an "infernal tariff," and the panacea proposed for this is free trade, for which there is an English patent to be sold cheap for export only. Once more it is subsidies for cheap transportation by land and water. Then it is the tax on whisky and tobacco which is evaded by many who wilfully refuse the use of either. Finally no comfort or patriotism, it is alleged, can be expected until the Government not only furnishes a free homestead of one hundred and sixty acres but shall furnish the farming-tools and pocket-money to work it. When no other bug-a-boo has seemed available, the cry of contraction has been kept up until every broken prodigal considers himself down with the disease, down certainly in credit, if that can be said to be down which was never up. The recent vicissitudes in business most undoubtedly have been great, and many worthy men have been prostrated, but contraction has had as little to do with their prostration as the telephone or the Keeley motor.

The charge that contraction was and is the potential cause of the widespread dullness which has everywhere prevailed in business has been repeated with so much pertinacity that many well-meaning persons have accepted the charge as unalloyed truth; they believe themselves more or less to be the victims of contraction; and it may be well to inquire as to the exact extent of the contraction from which it is claimed the country has so greatly suffered. In the broad sunlight of facts it will possibly all disappear.

To begin with, there were on the 1st of January, 1875, of legal-tender notes and national-bank notes in circulation $736,128,250, and on the 1st of May, 1878, there were $669,822,695, or an apparent diminution of $66,305,555. As an offset, however, to this it is just to claim that the increase of gold and silver money in the country has much more than replaced all of the dismissed paper. In the Treasury alone there has been an addition since the 1st of January, 1875, less coin certificates, of $56,235,942, and also an addition to the coin represented by coin certificates of $30,326,200. This rubs out at once the assumption that there has been any contraction at all. I do not take into the account fractional currency, as that, so far as it has disappeared, was at once replaced by subsidiary silver coins.

There has been no stringency in the money market since 1875—only continued dullness. No properly supported demand for money has been refused. Moreover $26,000,000 of legal tenders were issued by Secretary Richardson, soon after the panic of 1873, as a temporary measure, though with somewhat of disputed authority, but with an undisputed purpose of a withdrawal whenever the exigency should have passed away. After 1867, for years the outstanding legal tenders had stood at $356,000,000; but they were suddenly increased to $382,000,000 without the slightest benefit to the country.

Again, it should be observed that coin certificates are in constant circulation, and they must be included as perhaps the best part of paper money circulation. There is no doubt about their redemption on presentation. With such a state of facts it requires no small amount of patience to listen to impassioned tirades about contraction of the volume of available money. There has been no contraction except that done by the imagination, which diverts itself by a contraction of truth. If there is less of one sort of money there is much more of another; and its character has only changed for the better, as will be seen by the following statement:

	January 1, 1875.	May 1, 1878.
United States legal-tender notes	$382,000,000 00	$346,681,016 00
National bank notes	354,000,000 00	323,141,679 00
Coin in the Treasury, (less coin certicates)	44,809,784 88	101,045,736 88
Coin certificates	24,655,300 00	54,981,500 00
Total	805,465,084 88	825,849,931 88

Instead of contraction, this table shows we have over $20,000,000 more money than we had in 1875.

True, not so much money has been wanted or could be used; and if the contraction sometimes charged had actually taken place, under existing circumstances it would have had no perceptible effect. Its absence would not have been noticed.

What seems to be most lacking is not so much the lack of money as the lack of confidence. The large depreciation of the stocks of many of the best banking institutions of the country shows that, while their capital has been subjected to more onerous taxation, national, State, and local, than any other kind of property in the country, they have been wholly unable for some years past to loan their capital at much profit. If they have kept up their usual line of discounts, it has been done at unremunerative rates, and at greater risks. And yet they are subjected to political reproach for not doing more when there was nothing more to do. The very large amount of bank deposits is another signal proof that the demand for money has dried up, and sagacious operators have largely ceased to apply for discounts. They want confidence, and will venture nothing more than driblets until they can build on the solid rock.

A practical resumption of specie payments, will, it is true, add largely to the volume of money seeking employment, not only in the usual channels of business, but in all markets, whether of the cities or of the country, and will give a more healthy activity as surely to idle labor as to idle capital. Resumption restores to gold and silver all the functions of money. Neither will then lie dormant in hidden burrows, nor be bought and kept as mere merchandise at the expense of more than an equal amount of currency, but will become co-workers with all the paper redeemable in coin at the will of the holder. A healthy augmentation of the volume of money will at once appear and the loud common-scolds against contraction will have not even the skeleton of the dead topic to point at, and no delusive watchword with which to stun the ears of honest men. The only other vocation that will be missed will be that of the gold broker. The only tenement that will be vacated will be the gold-room of the commercial metropolis, and from that the "bulls" and "bears" may be expected to depart without asking for further reverence. Whether lovely or unlovely in life, in death they will not be divided. The premium on gold will cease to pursue any contract. Enterprises and engagements can be entered upon without palpitating apprehension that a change may occur in a single night, bringing to one or the other party grief or bankruptcy. Merchants will no longer fear that the gains of one month will be swallowed up by the losses of the next. Manufacturers will buy their raw material and sell their goods by the same standard. Ships that escaped disaster at sea will not be overtaken by disasters hardly less perilous upon their return home, from changes in the standard value of money. The industries of the country, responding to a stable reward, it is to be hoped, will have all joints lubricated and all energies in full play.

The great barometer of the money market in our country is located unquestionably at New York. Here the daily transactions, second in magnitude only to those of London, show the exchangeable value of money and the current rate of usance. The latter has been and now is far below that authorized by laws of the State. The average rate of interest since 1875 for commercial paper having been but a fraction over 5 per cent., and about 3 per cent. on call loans, it would seem that it was not more money that was demanded so much as greater faith in the stability of financial affairs and in the wisdom of future congressional legislation, which it is to be feared must always be more or less a disturbing element. It is the unsteadiness at the helm which shipwrecks so much of American enterprise and makes remunerative, permanent investments almost an impossibility. The real wealth of our country, as of every other, resides in its labor. The future productive power it has in store is more than all we now possess. I want to put that power at work, and, with the stimulus of more certain and higher rewards, to encourage every idle dollar to come forth, to take its life in hand, and risk it somewhere by putting all of the great forces of human industry in motion. Would not this be a beneficent result? But are Senators quite sure of promoting this object, or of securing even much local welfare by needlessly provoking a fend between capital and labor, or by red-hot-poker rhetoric denunciatory of sections accused of wickedly holding some share of the capital of the country that has been so long harassed and made timid and sensitive by untoward national events? Will capital abide with or flee to and hug those who would burn it at the stake? For capital as a master I feel nothing but scorn; but for capital when it carries upon its shoulders the labor of the country I have unbounded respect.

Some stray and very loose assertions here and elsewhere have been made about the shrinkage in the value of property in consequence of the resumption act. In getting down from a depreciated paper currency to the world's standard of money, some difference, a downward grade, was to have been expected, and were we again to ascend to the summit of paper expansion, the slippery descent must follow. It has been assumed that this difference amounted to 40 or 50 per cent.; but these wild guesses are always wild exaggerations. According to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] it has somewhere been recently said, that "a hundred dollars to-day will buy as much of every other description of property as $200 would have done three years ago." I am sure the Senator will be glad to be assured that there is no data upon which such a statement can rest. Those who desire to satisfy themselves on this point can refer to tables in the American Almanac of 1878, (see table A,) where they will find the average price of a large number of leading articles in New York in January of each year, and will see that butter, coffee, hams, mackerel, pork, raw sugar, tobacco and whisky were all actually higher in 1877 than in 1874, while a very small reduction appears as to some articles and larger as to others, but not larger than has often appeared long before resumption was resolved upon. The table does not reach beyond 1877, but no one claims a large reduction of prices within the past year, save such as result from excessive crops. No wonder the little girl, when told that she must not believe all she heard, exclaimed, "the world is all hollow, and my doll is stuffed with saw dust; and, if you please, I would like to be a nun." If the list of articles I have named are property, then the statement referred to will not need to be again contradicted, as it is "stuffed" with altogether too much "saw-dust."

The sale of the $50,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, at 1¼ per cent. premium in gold, is a proper theme of congratulation to our people, save perhaps an omnibus load of irreconcilables who possibly might be made happy if the credit of our Government should sink so low that United States obligations would no longer be marketable at any price; but, fortunately, neither the anger nor the eloquent loquacity of these few can any longer be formidable. The future promise to all is gain, not loss; and gain never produces a brood of croakers.

Resumption is a measure apart from the interests of the bondholders—apart from the interests of gold-brokers—and looks solely to giving a more absolute and unchanging value to the money which passes from hand to hand, and which the workingmen of our country are compelled to receive for their constant toil. It is good money for the people as well as for the bondholders.

This is our common country, in whose prosperity we all have an equal and abiding share. It cannot be for the interest of any man, however exalted or however humble, nor of any party, large or small, and however sharp and immovable its political boundaries, to labor for the defeat of an honest effort to promote the public welfare, which will place our financial affairs in the sound condition contemplated by the founders of our republican institutions; that condition which has so largely contributed to the growth of the American people, with only limited interruptions, throughout its career of a hundred years, and which every civilized or half-civilized nation aims at and would be proud to enjoy. To defeat a return to specie payments now, either by assault or by ill-directed attempts to hasten its coming, when we are on the brink of fruition, would throw a fearful responsibility upon those who should by any act of omission or commission become identified with the inglorious fact. The dearly-bought financial experience of recent years cannot be forgotten, and no sane man can wish to have it repeated or prolonged. Fictitious money, crop-eared and always at a discount, is not less productive of bankruptcy in morals than in business; and, wherever absolute verity does not prevail in the money current, the contagious doctrine of retaliatory or compensatory frauds is likely to be speedily engendered and widely disseminated.

Let me read some extracts copied from a letter written in 1876 by a gentleman who must command the respect of even the distinguished Senator from Indiana, who lately addressed the Senate on the subject:

Resumption of specie payments by the Government of the United States on its legal-tender notes would establish specie payments by all the banks on all their notes. The official statement made on the 12th of May shows that the amount of the bank-notes was $300,000,000, less $20,000,000 held by themselves. Against these $280,000,000 of notes the banks hold $140,000,000 of legal-tender notes, or a little more than 50 per cent. of their amount. But they also hold on deposit in the Federal Treasury as security for these notes bonds of the United States, worth in gold about $360,000,000, available and current in all the foreign money markets. In resuming the banks, even if it were possible for all their notes to be presented for payment, would have $500,000,000 of specie funds to pay $280,000,000 of notes without contracting their loans to their customers or calling on any private debtor for payment. Suspended banks undertaking to resume have usually been obliged to collect from needy borrowers the means to redeem excessive issues and to provide reserves. A vague idea of distress is therefore often associated with the process of resumption; but the conditions which caused distress in those former instances do not now exist. The Government has only to make good its own promises and the banks can take care of themselves without distressing anybody. The Government is therefore the sole delinquent.

The public mind will no longer accept shams. It has suffered enough from illusions. An insecure policy increases distrust; an unstable policy increases uncertainty. The people need to know that the Government is moving in the direction of ultimate safety and prosperity, and that it is doing so through prudent, safe, and conservative methods, which will be sure to inflict no new sacrifice on the business of the country. Then the inspiration of new hope and well-founded confidence will hasten the restoring processes of nature, and prosperity will begin to return.

To make the coin now in the Treasury available for the objects of this reserve, to gradually strengthen and enlarge that reserve, and to provide for such other exceptional demands for coin as may arise, does not seem to me a work of difficulty.

These words are those of the prominent statesman who was declared, 8 to 7, not to have been elected President. If they contained some plain truth in 1876 it has not diminished by lapse of time. He said "the public mind will no longer accept shams," and he would gradually strengthen and enlarge the coin in the Treasury. To him that did not seem a work of difficulty, and he viewed "hinderances to resumption" with abhorrence. His apparently reluctant objection to the act of 1875 was a fear that it would postpone resumption. That was unfounded, and we should take care not to furnish a better foundation for such a fear by any act of 1878.

It is quite proper to scrutinize the resources we have, or are likely to have, for resumption purposes on the 1st of January next, as well as the liabilities to be met; although if resumption should at the last moment be found inexpedient or impracticable, there will be ample time to postpone the day, or repeal the act, when Congress again meets in December next.

There are outstanding United States notes	$346,680,016
Coin certificates	55,044,500
Currency certificates	28,315,000
Making a total of	430,039,516

It is certain that some millions of the legal-tender notes have been lost, and that most of the fractional currency issued will not speedily, if ever, be presented. If we only permit coin still to be received for duties on imports it is equally certain that the amount will exceed the current demands for interest on the public debt. The small amount of other coin liabilities, including called bonds, may fairly be offset against new bonds to be issued, and bullion on hand.

Our resources may be summed up as follows:

Coin actually in the Treasury	$156,037,236 88
Coin yet to be received for remainder of $50,000,000 loan	40,000,000 00
Currency	39,478,140 68
Making a total of	235,515,377 56

This will give us a ratio of coin and currency, which can be instantly used to meet our liabilities, of 53½ per cent. The old ratio, held to be safe for specie paying banks, was 33⅓ per cent.; and our liabilities are most unlikely to be presented to the extent of even one-half that amount. All the United States notes held by banks would not be worth to them one whit more if converted into coin. They are, for the use of the banks, as much a legal tender as coin itself. The banks can gain nothing by any run upon the Treasury for specie, and they very well know that the facilities of the Government for sending home their own bills for redemption, offers ample security against any raids that can possibly be started by the national banks. The remainder of the United States notes are in a broad-cast healthy circulation—in the hands of merchants and other debtors to pay debts—in the hands of those who want them for daily expenditures, or of those who hoard them for future use, and only a small percentage could be massed at any point for redemption by even the most vigilant speculator in pursuit of a reward every day "growing small by degrees and beautifully less." The power of the Government to resume, if not indiscreetly hampered, is in no danger of being obstructed by any of its present surroundings.

Among the indications of success is the present revival of the business of refunding the highest interest bearing debt at only 4 per cent. The constrained economy of the country, on account of the great cost of suppressing the rebellion, and especially the economy of the last five years, begins to be visible in the resources which have been saved. We have bought less and sold more, as our imports and exports for the year just passed exhibit an excess in our favor of $99,605,603. This fact coupled with another that we are much the largest gold and silver producing country in the world, shows that all the conditions most needful to resumption are strongly in our favor. In 1875 the product of gold and silver from American mines was $72,000,000, and the excess of exports over imports of coin and bullion was $71,231,425, which left at home of our own product less than $1,000,000. But in 1877, the product, as estimated by the great carriers, Wells, Fargo & Co., was $100,000,000, or, as estimated by Dr. Linderman, $84,050,000; and the excess of our exports of coin over imports was only $15,387,823. This would prove, according even to the lowest estimate, that $68,662,177 of the gold and silver produced from American mines in 1877 did not leave the country. Somebody at home has got it, and it is here now.

My estimate may differ from that of others, but I should not consider it extravagant to assume that in the country outside of the Treasury and of the national banks there is in gold not less than $50,000,000, and of silver, including all of the foreign and American coinage, not less than $60,000,000. This would show that there will be over $300,000,000 of coin in the country on the 1st of January, to be re-enforced by all the silver and gold that may be hereafter coined up to that time, and further fortified by the bullion produced and not coined in the next eight months; and very little of it is likely to be exported.

From the statements thus submitted the prospect appears every way encouraging; and it is to be hoped that we shall not make a flash in the pan or defeat it by any misdirected legislation.

Some question has arisen as to the ability of the national banks to resume at the time appointed for resumption to take place on the part of the Government. But the character and resources of these banks make it certain that there will be neither hesitation nor difficulty about the matter. They are strong now and will be much stronger on the 1st of January next. Unlike the old State banks, every national bank is compelled by law to receive at par for all debts the notes of every other national bank. They are current at par wherever they may be found. Never at a discount. Not a dollar has been lost by any holder of these notes, nor ever can be. They are out of the reach of any panic. Diffused over a broad country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and held in the pockets of millions of people, they cannot be gathered and assorted in formidable amounts to be presented for redemption. The business of presenting bank notes will not pay when gold is only ⅛ of 1 per cent. premium, and when there will always remain the option of a redemption in legal-tender notes or silver coin; but whatever may be presented will surely be promptly redeemed.

There are now outstanding and unredeemed of national bank-notes $300,502,350. The issue beyond this is in the process of being retired.

The fund to redeem with is,

Specie	$54,546,201 89
United States legal-tender notes on hand	84,478,732 00
United States legal-tender 5 per cent. redemption fund	15,072,726 00
Making a total of	154,097,659 89

To this sum will be added the six months' interest on bonds, deposited for the security of their notes, due July 1, of $17,290,071; and another equal sum due January 1, 1879, or together $34,580,142; which added to the $154,097,659.89 will make a total of $188,677,801.89.

This, it will be observed furnishes a very large ratio of specie and legal-tenders to the circulation of the national banks, amounting to about 63 per cent., and will be abundant to meet any strain to which they can be subjected.

But they have a much larger reserve available at a pinch or in any great exigency. They have deposited with the Treasurer of the United States $343,385,350 in bonds for the security of these same notes, which will at any moment command the best money of the world at home and abroad. To secure deposits they have deposited United States bonds to the amount of $12,924,000, and they hold other additional United States bonds to the amount of $34,875,000, making a total of $391,184,400 of United States bonds now owned by the national banks. The security of the bill-holder, strange to say, is better than that the United States can give, so far at least as there is property and securities owned by the banks in excess of the United States bonds deposited to secure the circulation.

It may still be said that there are no visible means of meeting a sudden demand made for the large amounts of deposits, but it can be answered that even in times of severe stringency the aggregate amount of deposits seldom suddenly changes, as lenders only become more cautious. Bank deposits are diminished in good and prosperous times when nobody is afraid. It can be further answered that large demands for the payment of deposits have never been made except upon banks of deposit having no circulation and probably never will be, for the sufficient reason that the deposits of the banks belong to their customers or to their stockholders, and such persons will not pull down the pillars of their own temples when they would be the foremost to be bruised or crushed beneath the ruins.

A resumption of specie payments will remedy a great existing evil in the tendency of the bills of all national-banks to drift away from the places of issue and to concentrate at the financial centers of the country. With resumption the circulation will be sent home for redemption; each bank will have to bear its own proper burden, and it will be largely for the interest of banks in the interior of the country to maintain their circulation at home where the use of coin is never extensive and is rarely required. Instead of accumulating large deposits in other far distant banks and receiving a low rate of interest thereon, they will find the more healthy way of discounting paper in their immediate localities, and thus a far more liberal supply of paper money will be constantly retained and held in the rural districts.

The people of this country are endowed with a full share of intelligence, and they are not without some pride as to their character for staid, adhesive integrity. As a whole they are industrious and frugal. In the great race for the accumulation of material wealth for the two decades last past they have largely surpassed any other people. The products of agriculture, great last year, promise to be still greater this year. The business of the leading railroad trunk lines and of the inland seas, is already reviving; and that of mining and manufacturing is gradually finding a quicker market for surplus stocks. The laborer here gets nearly twice the wages paid to the same class and skill in Europe, where reductions and strikes keep up such a perpetual gloom that even war is hailed in some quarters as a silver lining to the clouds. All the landless among our people can have a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land by moving upon it.

All may, and for the most part do, send their children to common schools without money and without price. For debts which any may have contracted they have received a full equivalent, and they have too much of the spirit of independence to ask to have them extinguished or scaled by the Government. Nor do they ask to have the man who works twelve hours a day contribute to the support of the man who will not work but six hours. They love money, but they are willing to work for it; and they do not expect that any government can create money by magic and distribute it free as the morning dew to everybody without regard to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

I feel confident that they will be unwilling to echo the sentiments of one of the associates of Shakspeare's Caliban, in the Tempest, and announce that

> I' the commonwealth I would by contraries > Execute all things;
> * * * * *
> No occupation; all men idle, all.
> * * * * *
> All things in common nature should produce,
> Without sweat or endeavor: treason, felony,
> Sword, pike, knife, gun, or need of any engine,
> Would I not have.

Such ideas are contraband importations and foreign to our institutions. The American people are blessed with mother-wit and abundant common sense, and when they are portrayed in hot words, as supping on the horrors of the lowest deep, they see that it is not true; and when they are told that all there is of legal-tender value in this world can be created by the stamp of the Government, and be had without the sweat of the face, they know it is a delusion and a snare. The almighty fiat has gone forth to all the race of mankind, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," and there is no power of repeal conferred upon Congress, nor upon the princes and potentates of unlimited and irredeemable paper money,

> Without dispute,
> Through all the realms of nonsense, absolute.

I have endeavored to show that nearly all the serious obstacles to resumption have been surmounted; that whether or not there has been heretofore any contraction of the money of the country there will be none after resumption; that the state of foreign exchanges never before has been so constantly and largely in our favor; that we shall have resources in coin more than sufficient to warrant resumption; that the national banks can resume without any contraction of their loans and without embarrassing the Treasury of the United States; that property of all kinds, instead of shriveling up, will rise to a higher level when the policy of the country shall emerge from the regions of mistrust and uncertainty; that resumption will resurrect more than $200,000,000 of actual coin, and give vitality to the whole volume of money in circulation; that resumption is not in the interest of capitalists but in the interest of those who are paid by capitalists; that the House bill with any of the proposed amendments can have no other purpose or effect than to hamstring the Treasury and either to postpone resumption or to make it a perplexing if not a doubtful experiment. Let me urge, then, if nothing but discordant results can be anticipated from such a measure, that we for once give to financial topics some repose by a "masterly inactivity." Do not let us take the drugs of doctors who have never before had a patient.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask now that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside informally, and that we may proceed to the consideration of the bill, the consideration of which I moved this morning, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] rises for some purpose. Does he rise to speak on the pending bill?

Mr. DORSEY. I rose for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of Government for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the bill which he has named. The bill will be reported by its title, and the Chair will put the question.

The Chief Clerk read the bill by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the present and all prior orders——

Mr. COCKRELL. Informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not informally. The regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order. The Chair will put the question on postponing the present and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when Mr. CHAFFEE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CHAFFEE] is confined by sickness to his room, and is unable to be present.

Mr. HOAR, (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is necessarily absent in Massachusetts. He is paired upon political questions. I suppose he is not paired on this question.

Mr. VOORHEES, (when Mr. MCDONALD'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] is necessarily absent from the city this afternoon, and told me to state to the Senate that he is paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having first voted in the negative.) I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] I do not know how he would vote on this question, but it seems that gentlemen on his side of the Chamber have mostly voted "yea," and I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 20; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending order is postponed, and House bill No. 4245 is before the Senate.

JAMES SHIELDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list. It authorizes the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, formerly a brigadier-general and brevet major-general during the Mexican war, and a brigadier-general of volunteers during the late rebellion, and who was severely wounded in both wars at the head of his command, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list, with rank and pay from and after the date of the passage of the act, and repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith, so far as to enable the President to make the appointment.

Mr. SARGENT. I trust there will be no disposition to pass this bill without the sponsor of it stating the precedents which justify it and the reasons why it should be enacted. Unless I am misinformed, there is no case in which a person has been taken from civil life and put upon the retired list of the Army. There is no precedent, I think, where a person who has never belonged to the regular Army has been put upon the retired list of the Army. If there are great and controlling reasons in the case of this individual, I trust they will be stated for the enlightenment of the Senate; and I pause in order that the Senator who now calls up the bill may give us good reasons to control our vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to recapitulate before the distinguished Senator from California the history of this country for the last forty years. He is too intelligent and shrewd to be unaware of the grounds upon which this just application rests, and I do not propose to consume the time of the Senate in the advocacy of a proposition so plain and patent. I am sure that the distinguished Senator from California thoroughly understands the reasons why this bill should be passed, and unless there are objections which it is necessary to answer, I shall not consume the time of the Senate in making explanation.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator does not meet the point I make. Will he please state why a new departure should be made and this person taken from civil life and put upon the retired list with the large pay that involves? The Senate has already passed a liberal pension bill, the highest pension known to the law, for the benefit of this person. Will the Senator inform me why we should go beyond this and single him out among all the others who have rendered services on the field in the wars in which General Shields participated? I should like to have the reasons given; because we do not act in these matters spontaneously. If there are no reasons to be given, the Senator will not give them. If there are reasons to be given, I think I know enough of his character to suppose that he will not attempt to conceal them. [A pause.]

It is obvious that there are no reasons to be given in favor of the passage of the bill. If there are reasons in favor of it they apply to the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. I move to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint Ulysses S. Grant, late General commanding the Army of the United States, a General on the retired list of the Army, with the full rank, pay, and allowances of that grade, excepting that the General so retired shall not be allowed forage for horses or commutation therefor, or aids-de-camp or other staff officers, unless called into active service in time of war; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed so far as to enable the President to make this appointment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether or not General Shields is now upon the pension-list, and if so at what rate?

Mr. COCKRELL. He is upon the pension-list drawing a pension at the rate of thirty-one dollars and a half or thirty-one dollars and a quarter a month.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Has his claim to an additional pension ever yet gone to the Pension Committee, that the Senator is aware?

Mr. COCKRELL. There was in the beginning of the session an application before the Pension Committee for an increase of pension. The Pension Committee of the Senate reported an increase of $50 per month, and that passed the Senate and was sent to the House.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is now pending in the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask the Senator from California if the consent of the distinguished statesman and soldier named in the amendment has been obtained for its presentation in the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. It has not. He is not asking for this favor. Is the other person, named in the first section, asking for the relief that is proposed?

Mr. VOORHEES. General Shields needs it, and the other individual does not, as I understand the situation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand it so.

Mr. SARGENT. I doubt the correctness of that statement. General Shields is the owner of considerable property in the State of Missouri. He is doing well, and has done well for years, as a lecturer. That I am informed is his financial condition. If there is anything in the merit of his services, his services are not to be compared in ability or extent with those of the illustrious general whose name is mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator, I know, does not wish to make a false statement in regard to General Shields.

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all. I merely give my information on that point.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am certain of that. The Senator is simply mistaken as to General Shields's pecuniary condition.

Mr. SARGENT. Is not General Shields the owner of a farm in Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. He has a small farm in Carroll County upon which himself and wife reside. He has no means outside of that. He has been lecturing this winter in various places for the purpose of obtaining the means of subsistence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many acres does his farm contain?

Mr. COCKRELL. He would never have applied for an increase of pension or for a pension at all had it not been for his financial condition. He never asked anything of the Government until absolute necessity forced his friends to ask it in his behalf.

Mr. SARGENT. When did he ask for a pension?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to correct my colleague. I do not think that he asked for it at all; his friends did for him.

Mr. COCKRELL. He asked for a pension. As a matter of course he would have to make application for a pension.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. His friends did it for him.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator says he has not petitioned for this legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. In regard to the pension, I presume every one has to apply for a pension before it can be granted to him. I take that for granted.

Mr. SARGENT. The one named in the bill and the one named in the proposed second section of the bill stand then upon the same basis exactly, if the Senator from Missouri is correct that General Shields has not asked for this legislation. But I suppose that the person named in the first section of the bill is not being legislated for simply because he is poor. If that were so, we should have to enlarge the retired list of the Army by the addition of all who have been wounded in these wars; and this is not a general bill, but it applies to an individual. The only theory upon which it can proceed, the only one worthy of the individual who is proposed to be the beneficiary of it, is that in the Army he has rendered services which entitle him to this exceptional act on the part of Congress. Now, sir, if any such argument can be advanced in favor of General Shields, as I said before, it applies with infinitely greater force in behalf of the illustrious general who thirty-five years ago entered the Army of the United States and fought all through the Mexican war, and who was the head and front of the American Army during the war of the rebellion. If illustrious services entitle a man to this recognition, then General Grant is entitled to it. For that reason I have moved the amendment, and let us see whether there are some circumstances other than these which are on the surface which would vote down the amendment and pass the original bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment, as it is evidently designed simply to encumber the bill. When a separate bill of the character of this for General Grant is presented to Congress and referred to the appropriate committee and reported back it will receive due, and I am sure favorable, consideration.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no necessity for referring such a measure and reporting upon it. This amendment is offered in good faith. I want to test the feeling which dictates the original proposition; that is all. Any one can understand the proposition contained in my amendment; it does not need the report of a committee; it is not abstruse or abstract; it speaks for itself. The history of the country, in the language of the Senator from Missouri, speaks for the person whom I propose to place in this position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, there is nothing that I would not cheerfully give my vote in support of that would be to the honor or to the material benefit of General Grant. If ever a man earned the confidence, the respect, and the love of a people, General Grant richly won the love, the affection, the esteem, and the confidence of the American people. If I could believe that he desired this sort of legislation, it would only afford me pleasure to vote for the amendment of the Senator from California as a mark, and a very high mark, of esteem and of respect for General Grant.

Mr. SARGENT. Give him a chance to decline it. I trust the Senator will not deny that.

Mr. OGLESBY. If the Senator from California will allow me, I do not want to be enlisted in the support of a bill for General Shields or any other worthy soldier by coupling the name of the ex-President of the United States with it. I do not know that General Grant would care at this time to have his name considered in this connection. If I thought the Senator from California felt pretty sure of his ground and believed that he would, I would defer to the Senator's suggestions on the question. I do not know that General Grant would even at this time consider it a discreet or a proper thing for the American Congress to do. I do not know that it would be agreeable to his feelings. He has been very greatly honored by the American people, and he may live long enough to be honored again by them. I doubt the propriety of passing the amendment as suggested by the Senator from California.

Now, let us come to General Shields. The bill pending here which is proposed for his relief is one which gives me some embarrassment. I have known General Shields for a great many years. It was my lot in a very obscure sort of way to share one year with him in the Mexican war. It so happened that on the day he was wounded on the field of Cerro Gordo he was very near the head of the regiment of Colonel Baker. The company with which I was acting as a soldier then was upon the right of Baker's regiment. Although I did not see General Shields shot, I saw him a very few moments afterward. The captain of my company having been assigned to the command of the left wing of the regiment, as it was then called, I being the first lieutenant had command of the company that day, and after the battle was over, by the command of a superior officer my company was detailed to remain on the battle-field and we had under our charge for three days General Shields, who was badly wounded.

It can only be true to say of General Shields that he was a good soldier. It cannot be true to say anything else of him. He was a young and inexperienced officer in the Mexican war, honored with a very high commission, and, so far as I know, or as any other man knows, he discharged his duty intelligently and courageously. He returned to our State at the close of the war, and by his party was elevated to a seat in the Senate of the United States. It was found then that he had not been naturalized for a sufficient number of years to take a seat, and he returned to private life, and was again elected by the democratic party to this body, and served out one term here. He has also been a Senator, I believe, from the State of Minnesota. He has indeed been before the public eye in one way or another for a great many years. He is an old man, is well advanced in years, but yet he has something of life and of vigor about him. He was in the last war, commissioned by the late President Lincoln a brigadier-general, and I think served a year, or probably a year and a half; but he was at that time drawing a pension, which the Senator from Missouri seems to have forgotten. General Shields was drawing a pension when the late war began, and had been for some time before.

Mr. COCKRELL. A pension of thirty-one dollars and a quarter a month.

Mr. OGLESBY. No, $30 before the last war.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was increased to thirty-one dollars and a quarter by a subsequent law.

Mr. OGLESBY. He was drawing a pension, I presume, on his own application, for his wounds received in the Mexican war; and he was properly enough drawing it, for he had a very severe wound. That pension was suspended during his service in the last war, and at the close of his services he made application and the pension was renewed to him, and he is receiving now a pension at the rate of $31.25 a month perhaps.

An occurrence took place within the recollection of all of us, but recently, in connection with which General Shield's name, either wittingly or unwittingly, was brought prominently before the country, and it so happened that in that field he fell again. He was wounded severely and fell in the Mexican war; he was wounded and fell in the last war; and in the engagement which occurred but a few days ago he fell again. Heretofore he had fallen by the hands of the enemy, the last time, I believe, he fell by the hands of his friends. I do not wish to make any remarks upon that; perhaps it ought not to be alluded to; but evidently it was the provocation for this bill; it was the necessity for this bill. Nobody had ever suggested it before. General Shields had not asked for it. But all at once, after the experience or the catastrophe to which I have just alluded, his name is presented formally by a proposition to be placed upon the retired list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general on the retired list. I believe the compensation of a brigadier-general is $5,500 a year. If I recollect the statute correctly, I have not looked at it for a long time, officers on the retired list receive three-fourths of the rate of officers on the active list. This would place General Shields on the list, if I am correct in my statement, at an annual pay of something over $4,000 a year.

Now, Mr. President, the trouble that I have is not with General Shields. It is not that I do not respect General Shields; it is not that I cannot afford to sit here and say he has been a good soldier; that is not the trouble with me, for I happen, and hope I shall be excused for alluding to it, to have been in both the wars with him. It is within my personal knowledge to-day that there are thousands upon thousands who were major-generals, brigadier-generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants of companies, sergeants, corporals, and privates, who served in the Mexican and last war, but the larger number served alone in the last war, who rendered great, efficient, and most patriotic services to the cause of the country and the Union. Many of them to-day are crippled, disabled, and helpless, rendered so by the wounds and scars they carry upon their bodies. They stretch all the way from the ranks of the private to the highest official position in the Army.

Only a few days ago a bill passed through this body, and I believe it has passed the other House, granting a pension to the surviving widow of General Maltby, of Illinois, who was shot nearly to death, but who survived a few years and died of wounds received in the late war. He receiving no pension, his widow now, by this last act, is to draw $30 a month. I can go to the State of Illinois and can count soldiers by the thousands who draw a pension of $8 a month, of $15 a month, of $17, $22, $24, $30, $31.25, up to $50, the highest rate of pension paid to any soldiers of the regular or volunteer Army, except in three or four or a very few exceptional cases, men who have been through wars all their lives; that is, where there was a war in which they could be engaged, because they belonged to the regular Army—men who served in Indian wars and the Mexican war and in the late war of the rebellion. There are classes, multitudes, hundreds of thousands of them who served as faithfully as General Grant, though not as effectively, and who served as faithfully as General Shields. Now, shall I be excused, belonging to the ranks of that great mass of the soldiery of the Republic, in voting to take General Shields out of the great list of the wounded, and of the disabled, and of the poor, the worthy, and patriotic, and lifting him up here on the retired list, leaving all the rest in the rear? What conspicuous services has General Shields rendered in the late war that will enable me to say to the thousands of these soldiers through the West, where more particularly I meet them, that he ought thus to have been elevated and promoted while the rest of them are left to draw their ordinary common pensions?

Shall we open the retired list to all the regulars and volunteers who have served their country faithfully and are now somewhat indigent? Shall we transfer the Grand Army of the Republic from the high plateau they now hold in the public favor, and place them on the grand army of the retired list? Shall we cut off our general and tolerably well digested but not over-generous pension system, in which our party has tried as faithfully as it could to respond to the necessities and calls of these worthy soldiers, giving them the most we felt able to do by general laws? Shall we overturn the whole system or shall we stand by it and let General Sumner and every other general—for I cannot begin to name them—with General Shields stand together on the common pension-list by the side of the private soldier?

Sir, I will not lift the officer up, I will not make a conspicuous mark of him upon which to visit the benevolence of this body, and trample over the ranks of the private soldiers. No, sir; so long as I shall be here to speak in this august body, so long as I shall have a voice here, it shall be equally potent in conferring dignities and honors, pay, emoluments, and place, upon the grand army of the privates as well as upon worthy officers. The true soldier in war is the true soldier in peace. He takes the conditions of war alike with the private soldier in war, and when that war ends and he comes back again to the civil pursuits of life he ought to take the benefits bestowed under the pension laws alike and equally with the soldier in peace.

I shall be answered that General Shields was a deserving soldier. So he was. I shall be told that General Shields ought to be put on this list because there are men upon the retired list not so worthy as he. I am not prepared in advance to deny that. I do not know how worthy or unworthy some are who are on the retired list to-day, and I am not called upon here to defend that list. It may be proper that such a list should be provided by law. It may be that it is proper and wise to have such a corps to which to retire officers after long and faithful and useful public service. Many able arguments could be brought forward in support of a retired list, I doubt not; but, Mr. President, I have never made a speech or offered a word in favor of one. So I am not called on to defend the retired list. Neither have I felt myself called on to assail it or attack it. But here to-day I am asked as a soldier, as well as a citizen, to vote that a man who was once a distinguished citizen of my own State, who I admit to be a worthy soldier, shall be made a conspicuous exception, that he shall be taken out from the great army of volunteers and put on this retired list. How shall I answer the reasonable request of every other wounded soldier who has intelligence enough to know the value of the compensation which would be paid to him if lifted out of the ranks of the privates of the Army and placed on the retired list even as a lieutenant? He knows that the difference would be between $8 a month and the pay he would get there. As a matter simply of compensation, there is not a man who served in the last war that has not intelligence enough to know the difference. How shall I answer him? How shall I answer that great body of intelligent people throughout the entire West; and when special bills and special requests come to me, how shall I refuse to introduce them and ask the Senate to put every worthy wounded, honest soldier on this list?

You say "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" "let each case stand upon its own merits." That is begging the question. Each case is precisely alike; there is no difference in them at all. A man wounded by buckshot is as badly off as a man wounded by "a little more grape, Captain Bragg," or by canister, or shell, or solid shot. A man who has been shot nearly to death is badly wounded and will be until he dies, and is in the same fix as any other officer or soldier who was wounded or who contracted fatal disease from service in the war.

Can General Shields on reflection and can the friends of General Shields on this floor on reflection say that it would be a wise thing to lift him up and put him on the retired list because there are already three hundred on that list—three hundred and one I am told—and because there are so few volunteers upon it? Gentlemen of the Senate, if you are going to make a retired list for the volunteers of the Republic, if you are going to prepare a retired list for that purpose upon which men who served in the late war or in any war as subordinate officers, as non-commissioned officers, or as private soldiers, so state and state frankly and manfully as Senators ought to state. But if you are going to have a retired list to which occasionally you shall pick up a favored object of veneration, respect, or charity, or if for the purpose of getting over some rough political difficulty you are going to have a retired list for the accommodation of selected and favored volunteers, I am not for it and shall not be.

Sir, I do not know but that in the old age of our soldiers, when their declining years gather fast about them, and they come down close to the margin of the stream that divides us from the great unknown, all of them may want greater bounty, greater favor, greater liberality from the Government; and if all shall want it, all will be equally entitled to it; and upon this platform I mean to stand.

I should feel personally very uncomfortable to have General Shields feel unkindly toward me or feel aggrieved because I did not feel at liberty to vote to put him upon the retired list. So far as I know, I have always had his respect, though I had not spoken to him for thirty years until I met him a few days ago here in the Senate Chamber after the introduction of this bill. I have no other feeling than kindness toward him. I wish him well. I think I may say and ought to say, so far as my voice will reach, that he has served the country well; but I hope the general will remember that the bill before the Senate which I am asked to support is one that will bring great embarrassment to me. I shall not know how to explain why I gave this vote, if I shall give it. I shall not be able intelligently to explain to the great army of infantry, artillery, and cavalry, and of the marine, and naval service, and of all engaged in the public service in the Army and the Navy—I shall not be in a condition to intelligently explain to all the wounded and the disabled and the worthy why they should not be treated precisely the same way.

Sir, I know multitudes to-day of poor hobbling men who served in the late war and are now private citizens, with General Shields and myself; I can count them by the thousand in my State; intelligent men, men able not only to command companies but to command regiments, men who rendered faithful and conspicuous service in the cause of the Union, who are drawing their pensions of eight to fifteen or thirty dollars a month. How can I explain this vote to these men or to the surviving widows and children of the dead? Am I to suppose that they all desire to have General Shields put on the retired list and that none of them desire to have anybody else put there? Oh, it would be a very nice thing to do, it would be a very pleasant thing to do. You can scarcely, Mr. President, in the United States find a soldier who would not like to have this very thing done for him; and we were never a selfish body of men. The people have always told us that we were the most splendid set of fellows alive, "patriotic, noble, worthy soldier boys, that went out and fought for our country, we all love you to adoration;" and what is more, Mr. President, soldiers never grow so old as not to like that sort of talk. They are very fond of it, as you all are here to-day fond of being reminded of the noble deeds of your lives and of your usefulness as Senators and of the conspicuous part you have borne in framing for the citizens of the Republic a code of wise and judicious laws. All mankind like that kind of soft-sawder; and the soldiers are no exception to the rule. They would all like to be placed on the retired list, I mean all that body of them who ask for pensions and who receive and deserve them.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know how I can find any ground to stand upon if I vote to make an exception of General Shields to put him on the retired list. I do not see how I can do that unless I shall favor the claims of every other soldier who will ask the like facilities and the like mark of distinction and favor. I do not know how I shall be able to do it. I think the safer ground for me to occupy, I think the safer ground for this Senate to occupy, is to say to General Shields: "General, we will place you by the side of the other soldiers of the Republic; we will give you the pension that all get who rendered services like yourself; we will let this grand Army march on together, and if the Republic shall ever grow able enough to give them a higher grade or rate of pension, it will give it to them all alike," and any good soldier like General Shields ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. President, I do not think it wise, it does not strike me so on the moment, to place General Grant on the retired list. I do not know that he would like it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it not as wise as the other?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes, it is; but, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me to say it, I have not yet brought myself to the point of believing that it would be wise or good or discreet legislation to do it in either case. That is just the way I feel.

Sir, why do I stand here in this body honored as I have been, honored so far as political official position creates distinction and honor? If there be such an idea as that in the public mind, if I have been honored by having a seat in this Senate, it has been perhaps chiefly because of my services as a soldier. I hold the honor in the highest possible estimation myself, not because I have the credentials, not because the great State of Illinois chose to give me its confidence; but because it is a great theater where honest men may labor for honest legislation for the good of the country. Intelligent, judicious legislation makes the seat of a Senator an honor, and nothing else ever did or ever will. There are thousands of soldiers who will probably never secure a seat in this body, hundreds of thousands of them who will never receive office of any kind, more than hundreds of thousands who never seek office of any description at all. Thousands upon thousands of them must die in poverty. Therefore, I am the slower in coming to a conclusion to single out one, to take one, worthy as I believe him to be—for no words shall fall from my lips in disparagement of his courage or of his services as a soldier—to make this distinction, to create this list, to put him there, and give the others the go-by.

Whether these reasons shall have any weight with other Senators or not, whether they be good in the estimation of other Senators, they decide my course. After giving the subject as honest and as fair consideration as I have been able to in the time I have had to think about it since the matter came before us here, I have concluded that it is most consistent with my duty as a soldier once and a Senator now to vote against the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not quite concur in my mind with what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] said respecting the amendment offered by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] because the main fact that we have to confront is that the amendment is before the Senate. We are compelled to deal with it one way or the other. We are compelled to vote for it or to vote against it. We are compelled to say whether, upon the whole subject being here, we are willing to do for General Grant what Congress did for General Scott and what Congress offered to do for General Washington. General Scott, from the head of the Army, was retired with full pay, rank, and allowances. Is there any Senator on this floor who wishes to say by his vote that the services of General Grant to this country were not as important at least as those of General Scott? Is there any Senator on this floor who desires to say by his vote that the services of General Grant in his military capacity were not of inestimable, priceless value to this country? We may differ on either side of the Chamber respecting his political career; we may differ in this phase or that respecting his history; but as to his supereminent military renown, as to his very great and matchless achievements in the war that closed for the Union and with victory for the Union, there can be no dispute.

I thought it was a very ungracious question for the Senator from Missouri to ask the Senator from California whether General Grant wanted this done. Why, that would take all the grace out of it. You cannot find in your files a petition from General Scott; you cannot find in your files a petition from General Washington asking to be made lieutenant-general under John Adams. It is the voluntary nature of the act, and may I not hope the unanimity of the act, that gives it its grace. Let him go on the retired list whence the people took him; and if they choose to take him again from the retired list he will at least have this advantage, that the taking of him again will not vacate his commission. He will remain on the retired list, if you place him there, until the end of his life.

I do not know that I am the Senator who should most speak for General Grant. I never was on terms of even great personal intimacy with him; but I am an American citizen, and I happen to be an American Senator, and no proposition can come before this Senate in which I am sure my constituents, without regard to party, and far above party, would approve and applaud my vote more than one to recognize for all the term of his natural life the great services he rendered the country. The Senator from Illinois referred to the great honors and dignities that were offered him at this passing moment in Europe. It would be an ungracious response and it would be an ungraceful act, it would be a poor reply to all those courtesies in Europe, for the Senate of the United States, the highest legislative body on this continent, when it was offered to them to do justice and honor to General Grant, to decline to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEREFORD, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] I should vote "nay," and I presume he would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Order! Order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order must be preserved in the galleries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the history of this legislation, or rather the history of what preceded it, is a little peculiar. According to the public history, however, (which of course we are bound to suppose cannot be true,) a certain party in this country that has had a good many opinions within the last fifteen or twenty years, though the general tendency of them has been in one direction, thought it convenient to honor and employ and pay a gentleman who had been engaged for four years in an attempt to destroy his country; and in the course of that endeavor this, as I must suppose erroneous, history reports that the party was met with a proposition to employ a distinguished citizen formerly of Illinois and now of Missouri I believe, in the same place, who had unhappily as it appears fought on the wrong side, who had followed the flag of the Union instead of the flag of the confederacy, and he of course was beaten. That misfortune having fallen upon this gallant soldier, the hero of two wars as this bill states, it was then proposed to put him on the retired list of the Army of the United States, and a bill has been sent to us by the other House to do that, as I must presume if this history be true, as a remedy or compensation for this misfortune that had happened to him. He was not fit to be employed in the public service, having fought in two wars for his country, as long as there was anybody who had fought against his country that wanted the place; but he was fit to be put into the retired list of the Army of the United States as a means of pecuniary compensation for the loss he had sustained in failing to be employed otherwise in the public service.

Now let us see what the retired branch of the Army of the United States is, and what is the fitness of appointing any civilian, any volunteer officer or soldier who leaves his occupation and engages in the military service of his country in a time of emergency, and only engages for that time of emergency, and returns to his own private occupation when the emergency is over. The act of Congress of 1861 which founded the retired list, begins by saying that—

> When an officer has served forty consecutive years as a commissioned officer, he shall, if he makes application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and placed upon the retired list. When an officer has been thirty years in service, he may, upon his own application, in the discretion of the President, be so retired, and placed on the retired list.
> When any officer has become incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be either retired from active service, or wholly retired from the service, by the President, as hereinafter provided.

And that "hereinafter provided" provides for an inquiry into his condition, and if his condition shows that his physical infirmity has arisen from the faithful discharge of his duty, then he shall be placed on the retired list; if it appears that his physical infirmity has arisen from his own ill-conduct, dissipation, or whatever it may be, then he is to be wholly retired and not placed on the retired list. Then it provides that the whole number of the officers of the Army on the retired list shall not at any time exceed three hundred, and any less number may be fixed by the President at his discretion.

Sir, what is the principle upon which that statute is founded, which has established this retired branch of the Army of the United States and into which it is proposed to put by an act of the law two of the soldiers of the United States who do not now belong to the Army? That principle plainly is, and it need only be stated to convince everybody that it is that, that when a citizen of the United States devotes his life to the business (if you may call it that,) of the military service of his country and has spent thirty or forty years of service to it, having no other occupation, having given up his whole career to that one service, when old age comes upon him shall not be dismissed from the service, but may be placed upon this retired list and relieved from active duty; or when having thus devoted his whole life to the regular military service of his country he has become incapacitated in consequence of that service for the performance of active duties, he may then, upon due examination, be retired; but that the total number of persons who are entitled to the benefits of this act shall never exceed three hundred.

Does either of these distinguished soldiers fall within the principle of this statute? Every Senator who hears me must answer no, because they do not answer any one of the conditions which the statute imposes. Neither of them has served for forty or for thirty years in the regular Army of the United States; neither of them is now an officer of the Army of the United States; neither of them has become physically incapacitated to perform military duty as an officer. My honorable friend from Missouri shakes his head. I have seen both these distinguished citizens of the United States, one of them quite recently, the one whose name stands first in this bill as it is now amended; the other recently before his departure for Europe; and in my humble judgment both of them are capable of performing military duty as officers.

In the next place, what is to become of some two—it was one before, now it is two—of the officers of the regular Army of the United States who have served for forty years and who under this statute are entitled to be retired? Here is your limit of three hundred; and if there be now two vacancies so that the list may be filled up to the limit of three hundred and no more, the two officers of the regular Army of the United States who may now be entitled to retirement (and there are many of them) as well as those who have been incapacitated by their regular service are excluded from the benefit of the standing provisions of the law in order to rectify a political mistake that some party, eager for the reward of its friends, and perhaps eager to cultivate votes, has chosen to envelop itself in; and the Senate of the United States, without respect to party but as responsible Senators passing just and equal laws, is called upon to ratify the performance. Mr. President, I must be excused from lending my hand or my voice or my vote to any such contrivance, if I can use that word without offense to anybody, as I certainly do not mean any.

Then Mr. President, besides all that, as the Senator from Illinois has so forcibly stated, there is nothing to distinguish one of the persons named in this bill, the one in the original bill, from certainly—and I do not overstate it—scores of officers, citizens, soldiers who are now in private life and who now fulfill up to the full measure of description all that is said of General Shields; and too much cannot be said of him. He has been, as I believe, a good citizen and a brave soldier, and has served in two wars. So have scores of other officers; so have hundreds of subordinate officers in lower ranks than he; so have thousands and tens of thousands of private soldiers for whom the law has made no provision and it can make no provision; and therefore this species of legislation is partial, it is unequal, and it is therefore unjust.

We have provided for the volunteer soldiers of the United States, when they have been disabled in the service of their country, pensions, liberal pensions, more liberal probably than any other country has ever thought of bestowing; not too liberal for their deserts in some respects; probably not liberal enough in respect of some classes of persons whose capacity to do anything has been entirely destroyed by wounds received in the service.

Now, what is this species of legislation that we are called upon to pass? It is unequal; it is unjust; and it is contrary to any principle that the United States has ever before undertaken to advance or to enact into laws. General Shields has a pension, according to existing laws, that he has enjoyed for many years. This body has passed a bill increasing that pension, and I must presume that if he deserves it the other House will concur in the passage of that bill; and yet you propose to take this gentleman and another who has been added, and who ought to have been added if this sort of legislation is to proceed, as many others might be—you propose to take him and foist him into a branch of the public service with which he has no connection and which is founded upon a principle that does not apply to him. at all

If the Congress of the United States wish to give General Shields the sum of $50,000, let them say so; but why do you take from the ranks of civil life one or two volunteer soldiers and place them in the regular Army of the United States by an act of legislation and an executive act, to the exclusion of those who have spent their whole lives in the military service of the country, and who beyond the number of three hundred are always from the retired list, and in respect of these two individual cases the present law must necessarily exclude some two worthy persons who are now entitled to the places under the regular law that these persons would fill. If Senators believe that the people of the United States ask anything of this sort, if Senators believe that either of these two distinguished soldiers ask anything of this sort, then I think they are greatly mistaken.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I had hoped the Senator from Vermont and other Senators would have permitted a direct vote on this one question of placing General Shields on the retired list. The distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat voted for placing the name of General Grant upon this bill as an amendment, and now after having done that and got it in a position which he thinks will kill the bill, he comes out and takes a position against the entire bill, showing conclusively that the object of placing that amendment upon this bill was to defeat it, and to defeat it in an indirect way instead of meeting the issue squarely and firmly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend is vastly mistaken. I am opposed, as I have stated, to the principle of the whole bill; but if the majority of this body believe in this principle, then I am bound to say that General Grant is a great deal more deserving the place than the honorable soldier whose name is in the beginning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the retired list is not the pension-list. It is for disabled soldiers and those who have had long continued service in the Army, and not for those who may have been merely soldiers in the Army. Now let us see. I say that General Grant, although entitled to all the honors which this Government and people can bestow upon him, does not come within the requirements of this law nor within its contemplation and that General Shields does in the fullest and broadest and widest sense.

What are the reasons why General Shields does come within the provisions of the law? He was born in 1810 in Tyrone County, Ireland. In 1826 he came to America. In 1832 he located in Kaskaskia, Illinois, and began the practice of the law. In 1836 he was elected a member of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois. In 1839 he was elected auditor of the State of Illinois. In 1843 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the State of Illinois. In 1845 he was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States. July 1, 1846, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers in the Mexican war, and actively and gallantly and heroically participated in the engagements at Cerro Gordo, April 17 and 18, 1847; Contreras, August 19 and 20, 1847; San Geronimo and Churubusco, August 20, 1847; San Augustin, September 8, 1847; Chapultepec, September 12 and 13, 1847. In the battle of Cerro Gordo, on the 18th of April, 1847, he was severely wounded; in the battle of Chapultepec, on the 12th and 13th of September, 1847, he was severely and reported mortally wounded. April 18, 1847, he was appointed brevet major-general on account of gallantry and meritorious conduct. July 20, 1848, he was honorably discharged. In 1848 he was appointed governor of the Territory of Oregon, a position which he declined. In 1849 he was elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois for the term from March 4, 1849, to March 3, 1855, and served out the term. In 1857 he was elected Senator to the United States Senate from the State of Minnesota on the admission of that State into the Union and served about one year, till the expiration of the term, March 3, 1859. On the 19th of August, 1861, he was appointed a brigadier-general. He was then at Mazatlan, Mexico. He reported that his health unfitted him for active duty, but that as soon as his health would permit he would accept the position tendered him. December 10, 1861, he accepted the appointment which had been made in August, and after some delay was commissioned a brigadier-general to date from December 10, 1861. He was then assigned to the command of General Landers's brigade in General BANKS's command in the Valley of the Shenandoah, and succeeded to the command of the division, General Landers having died, and in command of that division he participated in the battle at Kearnstown, commonly called Winchester, March 23, 1863, where he was wounded by the fragment of a shell fracturing his left arm above the elbow, bruising his shoulder and injuring his side. He resigned and his resignation took effect, after having performed other duties, in August, 1863.

Since that time he was elected a member of Congress, but his seat was not given to him; he served as a member of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri in 1874 and 1875.

Here is his record: three wounds, one reported mortal; his left arm fractured above the elbow, shot through the body at Cerro Gordo with grape-shot, and then wounded again at Chapultepec, and then again in the last war, severely wounded in the left arm. Any one who is familiar with General Shields's condition knows that he has but the wreck of a body left, by reason of the fearful wounds received on three separate and distinct occasions in two distant wars. Here is this man born in Ireland, coming to America in his youth, a boy sixteen years old, making this his adopted home, serving in almost every capacity of the Government from the highest to the lowest, a member of the Legislature in the legislative department, a judge of the supreme court of a State, Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, a Senator in this body from two different States, a soldier and general in the Army of the United States in two wars, distinguished in every position he occupied from the highest to the lowest, and by his uprightness, by his integrity, by his services to his adopted country, by his high character and heroism he has added luster and given character to the country of his adoption as well as to the land of his birth; and he is the man that we are asked to-day to place upon the retired list of the Army, disabled, wounded, impoverished. He was not one of those gifted statesmen who upon a salary of $5,000 a year in a few years could actually make hundreds of thousands of dollars! He went into office poor; he lived upon the salary of his office; and he came out poor. He served his country in every capacity faithfully, gallantly, soldierly, justly; and this is but a simple act of just compensation, long withheld; and whenever another bill is presented in this body placing on the retired list any other citizen of the United States who has occupied the same positions that General Shields has, I will vote for it and will advocate it heartily and cheerfully. It is an exceptional case; it stands solitary and alone, so far as the records show, and he is entitled to this. The honor of the country, the noblest feelings which should inspire a patriot people, demand that this relief should be given him.

Since this bill has been pending in Congress the governors of States, the mayors of great cities of the West, those two young giants, Chicago and Saint Louis, have vied with each other in doing honor to this distinguished and gallant old soldier, patriot, and statesman. To-day there was laid upon your desk, Mr. President, and placed upon the desks of Senators, the memorial of the city of Chicago, asking for the passage of this bill. Saint Louis has done or will do the same thing. Petitions and memorials have come up spontaneously from the warm hearts of the patriot people of the United States in behalf of the passage of this bill. They have come from the soldiers, the private soldiers, the men whom every soldier loves and admires, the men for whom the distinguished Senator from Illinois has such kindly feeling, and I share it with him; the gallant men who with their knapsacks and their muskets bore the heat and burden of the day. They are the men who are asking this tardy justice at the hands of Congress for their distinguished leader.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will pass the bill as it came from the House; I care not what may have been its object in the House, whether it was introduced there for buncombe or not; we have nothing to do with that. Here is a bill passed by the House presented to the Senate; we must act upon it and act as a Senate should act. I shall reserve the right to have a separate vote, and I now make the reservation, upon the amendment, and I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the bill comes into the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, as I have a right to do, I shall reserve the right to have a separate vote upon the amendment. I do this, not because I would cast a slur upon the name of that gallant soldier, General Grant, but I must confess I can but feel that it would be a stigma, a stain, a blur upon his character to tack on this amendment to this bill—to tack on the name of General Grant to a bill for the relief of General Shields or general anybody else. He stands before the world and before the American people upon his own merits, and I say that it is an effort to cast a stigma upon him. It will add nothing to his character, nothing to his standing. He does not need this financially. There are other honors which, I presume, will be held in reserve for him. I would feel sorry to think that he should be retired from the public gaze and from the admiration of the American people and shelved upon the retired list of the Army with a parcel of disabled and maimed and wounded soldiers of their country.

I ask my friends on the opposite side of the Chamber not thus to deal with so gallant a soldier. Let any bill for him stand upon its own merits. General Shields needs the relief which is proposed to be granted here. Not $5,000, not $4,000, about $3,000, my recollection is, will be the pay he will be entitled to receive, or probably a little less, on the retired list, three-fourths of the actual pay of the grade.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How much would General Grant get under the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe the regular pay of the General is about $13,000 or $14,000, and he would get three-fourths of that. I know that a great many must have voted for the amendment in good faith; but the position taken by the Senator from Vermont shows that it was put here to kill the bill, because he voted for the amendment and then opposed both the measures.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. I do hope, as a matter of sheer justice to this gallant old soldier, that this bill will pass without amendment, as it came from the House; and when reported to the Senate I shall ask for a separate vote again upon the amendment, with the hope that the Senate will not tack it on to this bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, every man who on any occasion hazards his life in defense of his honest convictions, commands my respect. Therefore, I respect General Grant and I respect General Shields. I shall vote to place General Shields on the retired list, and I shall not vote to place General Grant on the retired list. Why? So far as the great merit is concerned, the hazard of their lives in the defense of their country, as they considered it, they stand equal; each did his best; each was brave, faithful, zealous, and true. Hence, each is entitled to the respect of every man who is himself entitled to respect. But here is the difference: General Shields is now old, infirm, wounded, helpless, and in want; and, in my judgment, there is no more patriotic act a government can do than to take care of a man who is unable to take care of himself, when that man has hazarded his all for that government. General Grant is not old; he is not infirm; he is not helpless; he is not wounded, and he is not in want. Therefore he is not in the condition of General Shields, and cannot be placed in the same category with General Shields.

Again, the House of Representatives, without regard to party, by an almost unanimous vote, as I understand, republicans and democrats, representing the people of this country, have declared that in their opinion General Shields ought to be placed on the retired list. As the House of Representatives thus embracing all parties, representing all sections and the whole country, have sent us this declaration, I respect it, and shall vote to concur with it. The House of Representatives have not thus said that General Grant ought to go on the retired list; neither party, no party, and no portion of any party representing the people in the House has said so. Therefore I see no necessity for me to undertake it here.

Again, General Shields desires to go on the retired list, as I understand; General Grant does not desire to go on the retired list; General Grant has not asked to go on the retired list. My greatest objection to General Grant is that he is a man who will not retire. [Laughter.]

If he will agree to take this and retire, perhaps I could find it consistent with my wishes to vote for it. [Laughter.] Whether in this sentiment all the gentlemen on the other side will concur with me or not I do not know. Perhaps there are some on that side who would be very glad to retire General Grant. [Laughter.] I expect some would, and really in that respect, so far as retiring is concerned, I would help them if the General would retire. [Laughter.] But the General will not retire. There is the trouble about that.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to remark to the Senator that General Grant is too old to change his habits in respect to retiring.

Mr. HILL. No, he will not retire. He is not one of the retiring sort, I admit. [Laughter.] He never did retire; he never will retire, and you cannot retire him, gentlemen; you need not try. [Laughter.] I wish you could. Not that I wish him any harm; by no means; for General Grant has my respect for many reasons.

There is another reason why I cannot vote for this amendment and will vote for the bill. If General Grant has one quality that distinguishes him above all other things, it is his directness. He is a direct man. He does nothing in ambuscade; he does nothing by angles; he moves in straight lines. This is an attempt to use General Grant's name in an indirect way to kill General Shields, and I do not believe that General Grant, if he were here, would approve it. It is inconsistent with his nature; it is inconsistent with his life; it is inconsistent with his character; and I believe to-day, if General Grant were to hear that his name was being used by the Senate as an indirect way of killing off a poor, helpless old soldier, with wounds all over him, and who had offered over and over again his life for his country, General Grant would telegraph to stop it. I do not believe he would approve it. I believe his name is being used to accomplish an end that General Grant would not approve. The best way is to meet this thing squarely and fairly. General Grant has not asked it.

Now, sir, I say here—and I am willing to have it go on the record, and I will stand by it—I have as much respect for a brave man who was on one side as on the other; and I admit that no one on a certain side of the late conflict is entitled to the favors of this Government in this shape as those who fought on the other, and I have not and never will advocate granting them. But, sir, if the time shall ever come when misfortune shall overtake General Grant, and he, like General Shields, shall be hobbling up and down this earth poor, old, infirm, and in want, my vote will be cheerfully given that he shall never be in want. [Applause in the galleries.] Until then, let him rest.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I have a very few words to say on this subject. I had supposed until to-day that I had a very high regard for General Grant and his character, and I was somewhat surprised to learn from the Senator from Missouri that my political associates on this side of the Chamber and myself were engaged in casting reproach and a slur upon him. I am sure we did not intend it, and I am sure he will be somewhat surprised at the information that we are casting reproach upon him; and whether or not he will be gratified that the Senator from Missouri and his friends have shown their appreciation of him by the votes they have given is a matter that I shall not attempt to determine.

This bill proposes to make a wholly new departure, as I understand, in what has heretofore been the policy of our country. It proposes to establish a new policy which I do not believe to be a wise policy.

I think if we commence this thing we shall find men all over this country, in every State in the Union, who are old—they may not have all been born in Ireland, but men who are needy and who have served their country faithfully and patriotically. If we undertake to place them all on the retired list of the Army of the United States those of us who have farms will have to sell our farms to raise the money to pay them. For that reason I shall vote against this bill, whether the name of General Grant be attached to it or whether it be not attached.

My service upon the Pension Committee of this body has enabled me to learn two or three things. By your pension laws a man who in the service of the country has lost both feet or both hands or both eyes, and is compelled to have the continued attendance of some other person to wait upon him, gets a pension of $50 a month. The Senate very properly passed a bill, at the instance of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] the other day, giving a soldier who had done his best for his country, (and neither General Grant nor General Shields could do more,) a blind man, who cannot tell day from night, who has to have the attendance of another person all the time about him, a pension of $50 a month. Of men like him and men who have no feet to walk upon and men who have no arms to do a thing for themselves there are how large a number on our pension list, Mr. Chairman of the Pension Committee?

Mr. INGALLS. Sixty-five.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Sixty-five. Sixty-five of them get a little over $3,000 a year, and the proposition here is to weigh General Shields against the whole sixty-five and give him as much as they all get. General Shields has both feet; he has both hands; he has both eyes; and yet we propose to give to him in this way, breaking down what has heretofore been the settled policy of this country, as much as we give to sixty-five men, some without feet, some without hands, some without eyes, and all requiring the constant attendance of some other man to care for them. Is that right? The Senate must judge. I do not think it is, and I will vote against this bill whether with General Grant's name to it, or without it. I do not believe the people of this country will misunderstand my vote on that subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, coming as I do from the State of Illinois——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I am told, and reflection satisfies me that I made a mistake just now. Instead of weighing General Shields against sixty-five men we are weighing him against five men. I, in the hurry of the moment, forgot that the $50 allowed those men was by the month, and General Shields' $3,000 or $4,000 will be by the year.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Coming as I do from the State of Illinois, I feel that I ought to say a word or two before this bill is voted on. Sir, I have known General Shields all my active life. The greater part of that life he has lived in the State of Illinois, and I claim that I have as high regard for him, for his character, for his gallantry, and for his sufferings as any man within the sound of my voice.

The greater part of his life has been spent in the civil service of this country. When I went to Illinois in 1836 he was a member of the Legislature of that State. Very soon afterward he was transferred to be auditor of public accounts; he was subsequently elected by the Legislature a judge of the supreme court of the State. From that position he was transferred to the General Land Office in this city. While he was in the Land Office he was appointed a general in the Mexican war, where he served two or three years with distinguished ability and where he received his chief wounds. The Mexican war lasted only about two years. After the Mexican war was over he was honored by the State of Illinois with a seat in this body. After he left this body he moved to the State of Minnesota, and was honored by the Legislature of that State with a seat in the Senate again. Then I think he moved to California, and from California to Missouri, and he has been elected to some offices in the State of Missouri; I do not know the nature of the service, but it was civil service, and not military. During the last war he served about a year and a half. He served in the Mexican war, say two years and a half, and the last war a year and a half; so that four years was the extent of his service in the Army of the United States.

I know that I give a vote on this subject contrary to the views of many friends in the State of Illinois whose good opinion I prize, but I must satisfy my own self-respect and conscience in every vote that I give on this floor; and can I say that there is any occasion for departing from the well-established rule upon this subject in order to make an exception in the case of General Shields?

The principle upon which the law in relation to the retiracy of officers is based is that the soldier has spent the greater part of his life in the military service of his country. The law itself says so. He must have served forty years or he must have reached such an age, sixty-two years. General Shields spent four or five years of his life in the Army; he is like a great many other eminent men in this country who, to sustain their convictions, as I have no doubt he did, joined the Federal Army during the last war, and from similar motives fought in the Mexican war. My colleague [Mr. OGLESBY] did the same; my predecessor (Mr. Logan) did the same; plenty of gentlemen in the State of Illinois did the same.

Now, sir, I could just as well vote to allow General Logan, according to my estimate of his services, to go into the regular Army and to be retired from it, and General OGLESBY, as I could General Shields; and so with hundreds of persons in the State of Illinois. There are hundreds of such men there, and there are some of them very deserving. There is one gentleman that I know in one of the eastern counties, who was a young man of as bright promise as there was in the State, who was totally ruined by the wounds that he received in the last war. I would do anything for him that I could. I would do anything that I properly could for General Shields to relieve his wants. I would vote an increase of his pension; I would cheerfully vote an increase of his pension to $100 a month, if it was necessary, in order to sustain him in his old age; but I cannot vote to make an exception like this in his case, when the law says that officers who are retired shall be those who have served a certain number of years in the Army, who have devoted their lives to the service of their country in that profession. Can I say that it is right or just in regard to a gentleman, no matter how eminent he is, no matter how great his sufferings have been, no matter how great his gallantry has been, that an exception shall be made of that gentleman, and that he shall be put upon the retired list at a salary of $3,000 a year?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Forty-one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Whatever it is, three or four thousand dollars. Sir, I cannot do that injustice to the hundreds of men who have served in the last war and in the Mexican war who have been wounded and who are in want, in comparative want. There are none of them in actual want, not one of them, that is, not one at the point of starvation. They are comparatively poor. When we speak of riches and poverty, we speak by comparison. Some people are rich with a small sum, while to others the same sum would amount tonothing at all.

Mr. President, it is with a good deal of pain that I have come to this conclusion on this matter, because I know that thousands of people in the State of Illinois think that this bill should pass, that General Shields's is an exceptional case. I cannot see it. I cannot see how it is so, how you can treat him differently from hundreds of others. If he had spent the whole of his life in the Army, it would be a totally different thing. He has not done that.

We all know how this measure has come up. It is an ephemeral thing of course. Had I been in the House of Representatives, I should have voted for him for Doorkeeper. My politics sit very lightly on me, and probably I should not have had anybody to quarrel with me about the vote I should have given on that subject. I should have voted for him; and here to-day I should cheerfully and willingly increase his pension to a reasonable amount, say $100 a month, enough to support him; but I cannot consent that he shall be placed on the retired list of the Army of the United States as a prominent exception of all the officers that have fought either in the last war or the Mexican war; and I do this with the most profound respect for General Shields as a soldier, and with the highest admiration for him as a gentleman and as a person who has honored both his State and the country in the various offices which he has held.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, the friends of this distinguished general once from Illinois, now from Missouri, saw proper in the other House to propose that he should be placed upon the retired list, a list upon which he could not be placed under the provisions of existing law. It required legislation to place him there. The considerations which prompted them to select him from a large class of soldiers and generals were peculiar, but sufficient, and in my opinion justified the distinction; and it gave me great pleasure, as it always will, to vote for any distinguished soldier upon whom it is proposed to confer either additional honor or the benefits and favors of the Government in obedience to any general indication of the public opinion of the country which he has served. When the bill was brought into the Senate, the friends of another distinguished soldier, men who are known to be and who have been long devoted to his personal and political fortunes, proposed that he also should be placed upon that list. I had no right to assume that the motive of this proposition was any other than that of a desire to do honor and service to this distinguished soldier, and I felt it to be my duty to respond to that although the general who was proposed to be honored along with General Shields happens to be a republican general and not a democrat.

If, however, the motive which prompted this amendment and the motive which prompted the vote in favor of it is to defeat the bill, I will not co-operate in any movement of that sort any further, though it is my opinion if that is the motive that the best method of thwarting the maneuver is to accept the proposition and put both these distinguished generals upon the same footing.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to say to the Senator from Mississippi that in what I said I supported the Senator from California in his amendment in good faith, and that with the amendment which the Senate has agreed to I shall vote for the bill. I did not do it with any design to embarrass the bill.

Mr. LAMAR. I trust that the Senator from Maine does not suppose that I intended to make any such imputation upon him. I was simply replying to a suggestion of others that such was the motive It is a very proper motive, very legitimate.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator think that was the motive of the mover of the amendment?

Mr. LAMAR. I have especially disclaimed that; I do not know. The mover of the amendment can inform the Senate better than I can.

Mr. SARGENT. I only inquire that as the Senator's remark was intended to relieve the Senator from Maine, and as I moved the amendment I desired to know whether the Senator from Mississippi meant to infer that such a motive actuated the mover of the amendment.

Mr. LAMAR. I take pleasure in relieving the Senator from California. I have no desire to impute any such motive to him; but it would really, I think, be much easier, if there is any such impression, for him to remove it by a statement of his own than by an inquiry of myself.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from California allow me one minute? I voted with my friends on the other side against the proposition of the Senator from California, although I was opposed to the original bill, because I was willing that the bill should go unembarrassed.

Mr. SARGENT. I stated distinctly when I offered the amendment that I offered it in good faith, and I now insist upon it in the same good faith. I believe the country owes to General Grant this recognition. During his long career, from the time that he entered the war of the rebellion down to the time that he retired from the presidential chair, my heart and wishes were all with him. I do not believe that General Grant ever had a more sincere friend than I was, nor that any man sympathized more with him in his work in the war and his work in peace. I offer this amendment as a tribute coming from my heart and deserved by him. It is not fair to say that a compliment offered to Washington, one offered to General Scott for great services, now tendered to General Grant on behalf of the American Congress, can be intended to reflect upon him in any way whatever.

The Senator from Georgia says that if the effect of this amendment would be to retire General Grant from public affairs he would consider then whether he ought not to vote for it. Sir, if the effect of this amendment was to cut off General Grant from active participation in affairs or from holding any honors which the Republic might wish to bestow upon him hereafter, I would not offer it or vote for it. Let it be distinctly understood that the law is that any man upon the retired list of the Army is eligible for any place whatever and does not lose his position upon the retired list by accepting temporarily or for any term service of the Republic outside of the Army. It is very true that he does not draw the pay of a retired officer and the pay of the station which he accepts, but on the expiration of his term he goes back again to his position upon the retired list. This in no sense, then, can be considered as retiring General Grant or having that purpose. That is a sufficient answer to that point.

It seems somewhat strange that those who have opposed General Grant heretofore, no matter in what work he has been engaged, are those who now think it necessary to defend him from this aspersion sought to be cast upon him by those who have been his friends. Would it be ungenerous to say that there is unanimity in support of General Shields upon one side of the Chamber because he is a democrat and that there is the same unanimity of opposition to General Grant because he is a republican?

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does General Grant ask to be placed on the retired list?

Mr. SARGENT. If General Grant asked it, I would not offer the amendment.

Mr. HILL. Does General Grant need to be placed on the retired list?

Mr. SARGENT. That I do not know. I have never investigated that matter.

Mr. HILL. General Shields, as I understand it, both asks it and needs it.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know whether General Shields asks it or not. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. ARMSTRONG] says he never has asked it. General Washington never asked it; General Scott never asked it.

Mr. HILL. I do not suppose that General Shields comes here and asks it, but I suppose it is well known that it would be exceedingly agreeable to him, and I do not think it is any disrespect to him to offer it in his condition. General Shields is in a condition to need it, and it is creditable to the American Congress to offer it, and it is not disagreeable to him to accept it. General Grant is not in that condition.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator proceeds upon the supposition that the amendment is in antagonism to the bill. Let him vote against the amendment, as he will in any event. I cannot convince him; but I stand here and say that the American Republic owes this to General Grant. As to General Grant's circumstances, I am not aware of them. I know he is now traveling in Europe; whether he will be a very poor man when that trip is over, or not, I do not know. For several years he received a large salary as President of the United States, and I have no doubt he saved something out of it.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say to the Senator from California that whenever General Grant is in the condition of General Shields I will take exceeding pleasure in voting to place him on the retired list.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not in favor of waiting until General Grant gets on his death-bed. I am not in favor of waiting until blind or halt he comes to these lobbies and begs Senators for charity. I am in favor of doing this because he has rendered great service to the Republic, and the Republic heretofore has done such things for men so eminent.

Mr. COCKRELL. May I ask the Senator from California one question?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator is so earnestly in favor of this proposition, why on earth has he not heretofore introduced a bill to accomplish this object? Why did he wait until a bill for the relief of General Shields came before the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. I would have done it if at any time during the last two years I had thought there was a hope that such a measure of justice and magnanimity on the part of the American Congress could have passed. I had no doubt at all—allow me to speak frankly; the Senator asks me a question—that the Senator and his party friends with him, with possibly a magnanimous exception or two, would array themselves solidly against any such proposition. Although the Senate might by a close vote pass such a measure, I did not think there was hope for it in the House of Representatives. But now, when in a case of inferior deserts, in a case which by no means is to be compared with it in any respect whatever, the precedent is set by the other House of Congress and insisted upon by the democrats here, is the time to do justice to General Grant and to recognize his great services, to show that his patriotism is appreciated by the American people.

I want to say to Senators that in my judgment so far as this proposition having the effect in the mind of the people to cast any stigma upon General Grant, I believe a large part of the opposition to the amendment springs from the fear that this compliment thus meted out to him by the American Congress may have the effect still further to call the attention of the people to the great merits of this man, as the ovation which he received in Europe had a tendency to do. If I be correct in this supposition, will some one respond to me why it is that the question runs here almost by party lines? With only one generous exception, (and I trust my friend from Mississippi will not withdraw his vote from this proposition upon suggestions coming from the enemies of the amendment as to the motives of those who bring it forward,) my memory of the roll-call is that every one else on the democratic side of the Chamber arrayed himself against this act of magnanimity and justice toward General Grant while in favor of the other proposition. Why is that opposition, except on the theory that I have laid down?

Sir, it would have been a most excellent thing for this amendment to have been adopted nem. con. in the Senate, for men without distinction of party to have recognized the fact that here is a man illustrious by his services, services both in the cabinet and the field, who may never again come before the American people, brought forward by any one, asking any favor, and the proposition is to give him a provision for his life. The man who saved the Republic certainly might be allowed the small pittance, for that is what it amounts to in comparison with his labors, from the Treasury of the United States to accompany him during his life. Tell me what business an ex-President of the United States, and especially a man like General Grant, can be engaged in without having a finger pointed at us by every other nation on earth, and by our own people?

Mr. HILL. There is not a man on this side of the Chamber who voted against the amendment adding the name of General Grant to the bill because General Grant is a republican. I do not believe there is a man who is willing to vote for the bill for General Shields because he is a democrat. We voted against the Grant amendment because Grant does not ask it and he does not need it, and this is not the way to pay him. The people have paid General Grant and will pay him again, doubtless, differently. General Grant does not ask this little picayune pay for his services. General Shields does need it; General Shields does ask it. He asks nothing else; and the people expect to give him nothing else. It is not the political complexion of the two, but the necessities of this person that control this side of the Chamber. The people of this country are not able to pay all the men who distinguished themselves and who have offered their lives in its defense. Therefore the people are ready to pay those who need their charity and their support, and not those who do not. It is not that they do not appreciate the latter class; they appreciate all alike; but they suit their charities according to their own ability and according to the necessities of those who may be brought forward as beneficiaries.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Georgia may be skilled in reading hearts and may read them more correctly than I do; but I think as I judge so will judge the country in that regard. As to General Grant not asking this, he is not accustomed to ask favors. He never has done it during his whole career. He does not ask them now; but his friends ask this for him; I believe the country asks it for him, and I believe there will come an acclaim from the country, from all his supporters, North and South, East and West, applauding the act of the Senate if to-day it should decide that General Grant shall go upon the retired list, as is proposed in my amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I did not propose to say anything upon the proposition before the Senate, and would not have done so but for what I regard as the gratuitous assaults made upon this side of the Chamber and imputations of being influenced by political motives alone in the vote which they have cast. If I know my own heart, I was influenced by no such considerations. The Senator himself, who has just taken his seat, has presented to the Senate a most remarkable example of inconsistency in asserting that the vote on this subject is controlled alone by political considerations, after the recognition of the fact, as he must recognize it, that for years past the party, of which he stands here as an able exponent and representative, have had an immense majority in both Houses of Congress, and at any time could have passed a bill of this character.

Mr. SARGENT. Since General Grant's Presidency?

Mr. WITHERS. Since his Presidency.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; not in the House of Representatives. We have not had the House since Grant left the Presidency.

Mr. WITHERS. It was not by any means necessary in recognition for his military services to await his retiracy from the Presidency.

For General Grant's military record I have as high admiration as the Senator from California himself. I recognize his soldierly qualities. I recognize and have often borne testimony to the kindness and generosity which marked his character and his conduct at the close of the war. If General Grant stood to-day in need of pecuniary assistance by a vote of this Congress, or if any intimation was given that he desired the expression of the sentiment of this body or that he desired such assistance, I would vote for it as readily as any Senator on the other side of the Chamber, and vote as liberal a provision for him, because I think that his services to the country demand such recognition. But, sir, the cases are by no means parallel, although the Senator from Vermont declared that there was no difference whatever between them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken. I declared there was a great difference in favor of General Grant.

Mr. WITHERS. I accept the explanation. Now, let us examine and see whether the position of the Senator from Vermont is sustained by the facts in the case. Here is a gratuity offered by the House of Representatives to a man not alone on account of his distinguished services, because I will admit that General Grant's services are more distinguished, but on account of the necessities of the individual. That circumstance, in connection with his distinguished services, forms the basis upon which this bill was framed. The one, wounded, disabled, broken down in health and spirit, is eking out a scanty subsistence, as I am credibly informed, by occupying the lecture-stand in various cities throughout the country and appealing thus to public charity for contributions to his support. The other is making the continental tour, fêted by kings, by potentates, by Mohammedans, by Christians, by infidels—the honored guest of every nation on the soil of which he places his foot. If he is poor, no such evidence has come before the American people. If he is in need of assistance, we are now to hear it for the first time. I undertake to say that if that time should ever come, the soldiers of that army who were treated with such generosity at Appomattox Court-House, and who were told to take their horses home with them to cultivate their crops, will not forget that act of kindness on the part of General Grant and will vote as liberal contribution to secure him from want as any republicans, the best of them, on the opposite side of the Chamber. But General Grant does not come before us in any such position. He does not ask, as the Senator from Georgia so felicitously expresses it, assistance at our hands. It is even questionable whether he may not consider it an affront. Under those circumstances, I respectfully submit that it is scarcely fair to encumber this bill, designed to afford relief to General Shields, by putting on the amendment which has been just adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The Senator from California insists that he is probably as good a judge of motives as any other person, and he asserts that the whole country from one end to the other will ascribe to political hostility the negative votes on this side of the Chamber. If the Senator will give to the people of the country that credit for their acuteness of preception which enables them to so clearly judge, in his opinion, of the motives which prompt Senators in casting their votes, he must think that the motives which have prompted him in tacking on this amendment will be liable to misconstruction by the public also, and they will attribute to precisely the same motive the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from California. I make no such assertion, but if the imputation is just, as deserved and justifiable in the one case, it surely is fully as much so in the other.

I therefore, Mr. President, have determined to vote for the bill as it came from the House, and I shall vote against concurring in the amendment of the Senator from California in the Senate, and I think myself fully justified for the votes that I shall thus cast.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from California, of course, settles any question as to his own motives in introducing this amendment. His statement is binding upon the Senate and upon Senators. At the same time, his course heretofore upon this subject laid him open to a suspicion of an attempt by an amendment to defeat the bill. In saying that, I do not mean that such an attempt would have been an act of impropriety. On the contrary, it is a well-known piece of legislative history that amendments are offered constantly for the purpose of breaking down the original measure if they are adopted. Therefore in any criticism that is offered upon the Senator from California it does not follow that it is an imputation upon him or upon his good faith. I voted against his amendment. I did it, I say frankly to the Senate and to him, under the firm belief that he had offered it for the purpose of crippling and defeating this measure. So far as General Grant is concerned, there is no proper honor that this Government could propose to pay him for his military services that I would not concur in. I draw a wide distinction between General Grant as a military man and as a civil functionary. If his own party friends are to be believed, some of whom are now holding high offices under the present Administration, Cabinet positions and other places, his civil service was the most corrupt in the world. If they are not to be believed, they are calumniators and ought not to be in their present places. As a military man, however, General Grant commands my profoundest admiration and respect.

In casting my vote against the amendment of the Senator from California I did not feel that I was so much voting against paying a proper honor to General Grant as I was endeavoring to defeat an amendment which was brought forward for the purpose of destroying the original bill. I felt, in other words, that I was not so much voting against General Grant as I was voting for General Shields. In justification of my want of confidence at that time in the Senator from California and his purpose, I wish to recall the recollection of the Senate to the 15th of April, when that Senator brought forward an amendment to this very measure of the most extraordinary character I think that ever was read in a deliberative body. I have it here. His proposition was then:

> That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the retired list of the United States Army the following distinguished officers of the late war, with the full rank held by each respectively at the date he resigned or was mustered out of the service, with the pay and emoluments to which officers of such rank upon the retired list are entitled by law: Lieutenant-General Ulysses S. Grant of Illinois—
